REV. LASHLEY HALL, B.A., B.D.

William Lashley Hall was born on December 31st, 1865, in the city of London. In his early life he spent his time in a chartered accountant's office. Later he acted in a secretarial capacity with the celebrated Booths for a number of years. He then came to Canada and entered the Toronto University, of which he is a graduate; he was also the first honor divinity graduate of Columbia College. In 1893 he entered the work of the Methodist Church in Western Canada and was stationed in various parts of this Province. He has always taken an active part in civic life and social problems, and is specially interested in a social application of Christianity.

Rev. Lashley Hall reported the Conference for several years. He wrote articles for the Christian Guadian which were highly commended, and is also the author of "Continuity of Revelation."

Since he has been pastor of the Mt. Pleasant Methodist Church he has become exceptionally well known in Vancouver. Under his pastorate the church has prospered having contributed $56,078 for all purposes and has made advance in many particulars. They have recently installed the finest pipe organ in the city.

At the recent Methodist Conference Rev. Hall was elected president of the B. C. Methodist Conference, and also appointed to Mountain View Church as pastor. That he remains in the city is a cause of general satisfaction.

A LIVE COMMUNITY

MR. W. PORTER, PRESIDENT OF THE RICHMOND AND POINT GREY BOARD OF TRADE

In the excellent and up-to-date grocery store of "The W. H. Walsh Co., Ltd." I had the great pleasure of meeting Mr. W. Porter, who is undoubtedly one of the coming men of Greater Vancouver. In addition to the management of the leading groceries of Eburne and Kerrisdale, wholesale and retail, Mr. Porter is actively engaged in many other directions. He is blessed with a strong physique, an active, logical and comprehensive mind, with a splendid memory for detail. His systematic methods, long experience and excellent business training, backed and motored by an enduring energy, enable him to accomplish much in many directions with the minimum of strain and worry.

Mr. Porter is the President of the Board of Trade, in which capacity he has been able to assist in several public forward movements. In fact, Richmond, Point Grey and the adjoining municipalities have come to recignize him as a factor of chief importance in giving direction and sound advice at times of critical stress. Perhaps one of the most energetic Boards of Trade outside of Vancouver is that over which Mr. Porter presides. He is also the president of the "Grocers' Association," which is an institution considered necessary in the largest cities nowadays.

One of Mr. Porter's most pleasing and useful achievements is that of being the primary mover in arousing interest in the Anglican Church, which, as a result of a strong putting of the case and need of a church centre at Eburne, has established an excellent cause which promises much good.

Mr. Porter is in Canada about nineteen years, during which time he has had an interesting and a varied experience.He landed at St. John's and then moved west to Montreal. Here his ticket ran out, and concurrently his pocket money vanished, so that he found himself on "hard-pan," as the old Cariboo miners are apt to say when on "bedrock" or "broke."

However, this young Englishman from Manchester, had the right material in his head, heart and body; so he determined to accept the thing which first might come along, with promise of cash in hand for honest labor. The C. P. R., which has been a god-send to thousands at a pinch, gave him a job in the freight department at the Windsor Station. Here he made his start, and from this small beginning he received $35.00 per month; he made rapid headway and gradually advanced until he arrived in the real Canadian West, Vancouver, and finally at Eburne Station, where he is an honored, a useful and a successful citizen of the most public-spirited sort. His past is a guarantee of a successful future, and we may look to hear from Mr. W. Porter in the near-at-hand time holding a much higher position of trust.

ATTENTION! "SUN" $2,230,000 FOR VANCOUVER!

Two million, two hundred and thirty thousand dollars for Vancouver. One million dollars to be used for harbor improvements alone. Who did it? Vancouver's energetic representative, H. H. Stevens, who has other light and help than that of the spotted "Sun."

BUSINESS AND BEAUTY

British Columbia Centres of Present Attraction and Future Populations

GIBSON'S LANDING

Here is a spot of beauty, a resting place, a health resort, a home-like retreat from the big cold world. Here are gathered the best of men and women who have sense enough to appreciate a good thing when it appears.

However, it is so good a place that one begins to fear that so many will be attracted by its beauties and manifold charms as to turn it into a city and a commercial centre. Should this come to pass, then those who have settled there will have to move further afield or aforest, or ashore, so as to find that which they now enjoy and would be sorry to see vanish.

As it is, there are three stores, a post office, a saw-mill, docks and candy-stores, and several hundreds of people of all sorts, mostly good.

Churches are coming to the fore. An Orange lodge is to be built ere long. The Orangemen are numerous, a cause of delight to all good men and loyal. There are Swedes, Norsemen, Danes, English, Scotch Irish, Canadian, Yankees, Bulgarians, Slav, and other people. These represent all sorts of religionists and economists.

Large numbers go thither annually during the resting season, and give themselves up to pleasure, recuperation, relaxation and nature-worship. I have a profound respect for these nature-worshipping humans. They do not get very far from the HEART OF THE ETERNAL. In fact, their love for nature springs out of their love for the Great God of Nature. And somehow they find Him without the help of any class of spiritual directors. And yet when these men, whose duty is that of spiritual guidance, do their work honestly, lovingly and freely, proving that they know the spirit and power of a new life, and that they make no claims to power over the lowly-minded sinner seeking light, then these men are kings and true helpers of mankind.

EBURNE STATION

The time is not far distant when a change of name will be needed. At present there is Eburne just over the bridge in Richmond, and Eburne Station on the north side of the North Arm of the Fraser. The bridge is the divider between these two places. One should have some other cognomen so as to avoid confusion.

The real town is that known as "Eburne Station." It is one of the marvels of urban growth in Western Canada, and promises to become a respectable city in itself. Of course as time rolls along Eburne Station will become a part of Greater Vancouver, and be, in all probability, under one grand central council.

The roads, streets, walks, sewerage, water system, buildings and other improvements are very city-like in many respects at present. The spirit of the people is one of strong optimism, and nearly every man has firm faith in an important oncoming future.

Just over the bridge is the General Store of Troup & Bentzon, the former from old Scotland and the latter from the land that leads the world in making butter—Denmark. Mr. Bentzon is a typical Dane of the stamp that begets respect and confidence. His ancestors ruled England before we were boys, and played their regal part like men that they were. These men are working up a good trade and mean business.

"Clugston and Barton" have a Hardware Store that would be creditable at the hub of creation, viz., Vancouver. It is well supplied with the best, in great variety, and few stores have so attractive appearance.

In another place mention is made of the splendid Grocery business of The W. H. Walsh Co., Ltd., which give all the people need.

The Eburne Saw Mills, Manager J. W. Abernethy, have grown from one of the smallest concerns in the lumber trade up to a veritable milling giant. Lumber of all kinds and grades, cedar and fir, shingles, and lumber cut to order, and finished to suit, puts this mill into class No. 1. The manufactured material is sold locally, and in the East, which has a most capacious maw, a blessing to the British Columbia lumber trade. The capital is locally found, and the output is about 55,000 feet per day.

Naturally I was pleased to learn from the storekeepers that the bulk of their goods comes from the Vancouver Wholesale Houses. This is true also of Port Moody and Coquitlam, which I visited lately.

The farmers have special friends in "Troup and Bentzon," who give special attention to butter, eggs, vegetable, and other supplies. Every help given to farmers and gardeners must be a valuable aid to Vancouver.

Already there are two Banks, the Northern Crown and the Royal. These are among Canada's most enterprising financial institutions.

The schools are in the hands of about a dozen teachers, and they are managed by a Board of Trustees.

I found one of B. C. old-timers in Mr. Leckie, the Eburne sadler. He came from Bruce, some place back East. I wonder if any of my readers know where Bruce is. Some say it is the capital of Ontario, and others affirm that it is the human supply house for the Canadian West. Well, my friend Leckie came from Lucknow, where my parents lived about forty years. Hence, as he came from my town, he is a good man and true. I had a pleasant chat about Bruce people, and as he kept his hands busy at his saddlery, I recalled the happy years that I worked at the bench, and how I had to keep my hands busy as I tried to chat with a friend who might drop in for a word.

I was indeed surprised with the splendid proportions of the Grand Central Hotel, which would be a first-class building, even when Eburne has a population of 25,000, as it surely will have during the lifetime of this mid-way generation.

The proprietors are Grauer and Dumaresq, and they are very justly proud of the internal finish of all parts of this large building. They cater to the general trade as well as to the Auto and Tourist people.

The charges are reasonable, being from $1.00 to $1.50 per day for rooms.

It is only a short run from Vancouver out to Eburne, and the streets are in fine condition. All who enjoy the rush of the auto. or the motor, or the buggy, or the foot, would do well to make a trip out to this bright young town.

The B. C. E. Ry. Co. gives most remarkably cheap fares The people who reside in that neighborhood can come and go on a five cent fare. Surely this is bringing travel down to the most economical. Even the ordinary fare for the non-resident is so cheap that it is no barrier to a trip, oft-repeated, between Vancouver and Eburne. The service is frequent, and is all that any reasonable man or woman should desire. The enterprise of the B. C. Ry. Co., which has been manifested for twenty years or more, is one of the most pleasing and promising features of Greater Vancouver. From the first to the present moment this Company, in spite of changes of the personnel, has been unsurpassed by any similar Company in or out of Canada.

And the spirit of enterprise is as active as ever today. What will be accomplished in the near future will surprise the most sanguine.

"THE POWER OF THE CROSS"

From time to time the above words may be seen on the bill boards of this city as an "ad." of a play, or moving picture, or other show.

The "ad." has a priest or other cleric holding up a cross toward the sky, as if the cross in the hands of any man is a sacred thing.

So far as I read history, the cross was the tool, or weapon, by which many people in old Roman and later times were put to death. To my mind it is a murderer's instrument, and is therefore a tool of the devil, and a very unholy and an accursed thing. No, I do not glory in the Cross, or in a cross.

The Cross of scripture, which cross the apostles carried, was not the murderer's cross, but was the load of a devoted life in the midst of trial and persecution. These godly men bore their cross, but it was not a piece of wood, or nails, or silver or gold; but it was a lowly, submissive, serving, loving spirit bearing up against the fiercest odds. And these men had to carry on their work in spite of the devilish cross of the spirit of their persecutors. They who persecuted the apostles and early martyrs were urged on in the vengeful spirit of their master, Satan. His instrument was the cross, on which he succeeded in impaling the Redeemer of Israel and the Saviour of Mankind.

I never did honor the cross any more than I would or did honor the stiletto or dagger of the midnight cut-throat. It is time that this Satanic instrument had its place. It is strange how multitudes worship the Cross and despise the Christ who perished upon it. They carry the cross and break the laws of the Father of Him who was murdered on the cross. These fierce cross-lovers and honorers have no hesitation in breaking the Sabbath Day, but they would never dishonor the Roman torturing tool.

FOR EMERGENCY

That Was Sir George Ross' Idea in 1910.

While I am not much impressed with what is called the German Scare I think the duty of England is plain, and our duty is equally plain; for the conquest of England means the conquest of Canada. Let the British throne totter; let London be in the possession of the enemy, let her ports be filled with foreign seamen and foreign men-of-war, and Canada would be blotted from the map as an English dependency and her autonomy would be forever destroyed. And although I do not think the emergency is great, still I think it is sufficiently great for us to be GUIDED BY THE JUDGMENT OF THE ADMIRALTY OF ENGLAND to prepare ourselves for all possible contingencies."—Sir Geo. W. Ross in the Senate, April 29, 1910.

THE PASSING OF PUGSLFY

The leadership aspirations of Hon. William Pugsley, who for some time past has been trying to oust Sir Wilfrid Laurier, have been annihiliated. The Pugsley bubble was punctured by Dr. Michael Clark, the militant free trade radical from Red Deer, and the ex-Minister of Public Works was humiliated in a drastic manner which has no parallel in the history of Canadian political life.

It came about this way: Mr. Carroll, the Liberal member for South Cape Breton was speaking on the naval bill the first day the new rules limiting speakers to twenty minutes became operative. Mr. Carroll had finished his twenty minutes and was proceeding, when the Chairman called him to order, remarking that his time had expired. Mr. Borden suggested, as a matter of courtesy that Mr. Carroll might continue his remarks with the consent of the House.

The following is the Hansard report of what followed:

Mr. Pugsley: "There is no rule; Mr. Carroll can contiue his remarks as a matter of right."

Mr. Borden: "I understand there is a definite rule of the House on this subject, and I do not think that my hon. friend's (Mr. Pugsley) mode of treating what I intended to be a courteous suggestion is very commendable."

Mr. Pugsley: "I seriously believe there is no binding rule. There was a resolution carried by the majority, in which the minority had no opportunity to make amendments or suggestions, I say it is not a rule of this House, but simply a tyrannical resolution of a majority of this House."

Dr. Clark (Red Deer): "I think the Prime Minister is, as usual extremely courteous. I totally disagree with my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) when he says there is no rule. The rules have been passed, and they are now the legal rules by which debate is conducted in this House. I totally disagree wth my hon. friend."

Later on in the debate Mr. Nesbitt of North Oxford allied himself with Dr. Clark in opposing the Pugsley policy that rules of the House should be ignored if they were not to the liking of members of the opposition.

This public snub on the part of Dr. Clark and Mr. Nesbitt heralded the passing of Pugsley from the battle for the leadership. And through it all Sir Wilfrid Laurier sat with impassive face.

METHODIST CONFERENCE

The 27th session of the British Columbia Conference of the Methodist Church was held in Wesley Church, Vancouver, May 15-21, when 225 ministers and laymen assembled to review the work of the year and plan larger things for the future.

The Laymen's Association showed marked development and manifested its influence in moulding the future of the church.

The addresses by Dr. S. Bland at the morning devotional hour were a feature of the Conference, and will have an abiding influence upon the lives of those who were privileged to hear them.

The elections resulted in the appointment of Rev. W. Lashley Hall, B.A., B.D., as President, and Rev. R. Forbes Stillman as Secretary, with Rev. R. J. McIntyre and Rev. John Hungill as assistants. Rev. C. Wellesley Whittaker was elected Statistical Secretary.

The Conference was saddened by the death of Rev. John F. Betts during its sessions. Rev. Joseph Hall and Rev. E. C. Fakeley also died during the year.

The ministerial session dealt with the standing of probationers for the ministry, advancing the men according to their years labors. Six were received into full membership and ordained.

A Good Place to Live East 10th Ave.

"Boost your district and you boost yourself," is a motto that is good for everybody and every place. Few districts, however, can put forth more efforts to make a neat appearance than the residents of East 10th Ave. This is a street of fine houses and clean lawns. Start as far eastward as the road is opened, away beyond Commercial Drive and walk back observing; even the most stolid will be forced to confess that it is a well built up street. Then when arrived at Commercial Dr. look at one of the most recent acquisitions, the modern apartment house built and being run by Mr. A. F. Andrews, 1629 10th Ave. East, the lawn in front is going to be one of the best on the street. The rents are very reasonable. But the road is the thorn. The city has left it just half and half. Last summer laying some curbing for pavement, getting hopes high, but the hopes are now cast down, as it is seen the city is going to leave it at "that." The road should be paved—the curbing is laid, why not the rest? Let the "city beautiful" movement keep moving.

Too Many Doctors Living in Germany

That Germany is threatened with an over production of physicians, that men in the profession even now can make but a precarious livelihood, and that the situation will be worse with the extention of the government sick insurance system, is the statement maye by Dr. Prinzing, the famous German medical statistician. Dr. Prinzing shows that there are now 33,527 physicians and 13,380 are studying medicine.

Mr. James Napier, of Ayr, Scotland, arrived in the city on the Imperial Limited Saturday morning, and is residing at 1752 13th Ave. E., the guest of Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Southcott. Mr. Napier is on a visit to his two sons, William and James jr., and during his stay will take in all the principal cities of the Coast. We trust on Mr. Napier's return to the "Land of Burns" he will take with him a good impression of the progress of this city.

Two men in the west were to be hanged for horse stealing. The place selected was the middle of a trestle bridge spanning the river. The rope was not securely tied about the neck of the first man to be dropped and the knot slipped; he fell into the river and immediately swam ashore. As they were adjusting the rope for the second culprit an Irishman, he remarked: "Will yez be sure to tie that good and tight, 'cause I can't swim."

SOMETHING THAT YOU HAVE NEVER SEEN NOR EVEN HEARD OF!

A Parisian Novelty.—In Europe it is used this year as a little Easter present, or rather a mark of courtesie to friends and relatives. Its value as a token lies more in the novel idea than in the price of the article. It is arranged so that it can be sent, just like a post card, for a cent or two, to any place in Canada or the Unied States. The endearing idea about it is the embedded LUMINOUS CROSS, which will shine all night long (or in any dark room) in a GLORIOUS, MYSTIC BLUE LIGHT, after you had it exposed to daylight for a few minutes. The price is so low that anyone is enabled to be convinced of its real nautre. It is indeed an article which is held in high esteem by any Christian family or person. The Shining Cross is made of a stone, which is found only near Jerusalem, and of which already the Bible speaks of as the LUMINOUS STONE in picturing Solomon's temple.

Prices are: 15 cents each, 2 for 25c, 5 for 50c, and 12 for $1.00.

(Signed) RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Senator William P. Frye of Maine and Senator Charles Curtis of Kansas had been having a long and somewhat heated discussion as to the authorship of some of the works attributed to Shakespeare.

"Well" said Senator Frye with finality, "when I die and go to heaven I will hunt Shakespeare and ask him about it."

"Suppose you do not happen to find Shakespeare there?" suggested Senator Curtis.

"Then you ask him," answered the Maine senator as he passed quickly out of hearing.—National Food Magazine.

A doctor who had a custom of cultivating the lawn and walk in front of his home every spring, says The Indianapolis News, engaged O'Brien to do the job. He went away for three days and when he returned found O'Brein waiting for his money. The doctor was not satisfied with the work and said:

"O'Brien, the whole walk is covered with gravel and dirt, and in my estimation it's a bad job."

O'Brien looked at hi mi nsurprise for a moment and repleid:

"Shure, doc, there's many a bad job of your covered with gravel and dirt."

"May I tell you the old, old story?" he asked.

She loked down, blushed, and nodded her assent.

So he told her for the twenty-seventh time how he once won the game for Yale.—Brooklyn Life.

Why The Country Trusts Borden

Because he has made the first real effort to come to the aid of the motherland in naval defence.

Because he stands for honesty and integrity in administration, and for cleanness in public affairs.

Because he believes in the square deal to all classes of the community, irrespective of considerations of race and religion.

Because he has carried out more pledges in the few months he has been in power than Laurier did in the fifteen years in which he occupied the position of Prime Minister of Canada.

Because he is not always talking of Canadian "autonomy" as if it were something to be guarded against the risk of being kidnapped.

Because he is a Canadian first, last and all the time, and believes that this great Dominion can best work out her destiny as a free nation within the Empire and not as an "adjunct" of the United States.

Because he is British to the core, and does not boast that if he had been on the banks of the Saskatchewan he would have shouldered his musket.

Because he never prophesied the day when Canada would be independent and drop from the parent tree like ripe fruit.

Because he believes in British connection and not Separation.

Because he believes in helping Britannia to rule the waves.

Because he believes in actions not oratory.

Finally, the people trust Borden because Borden trusts the people.

And this is the Good News:
God is a Father,
Man is a Brother,
The Earth is our Mother,
Life is a Mission, and not a Career.
Kingship is Service,
His Sceptre is Gladness,
The least is Greatest.
Saving is Dying,
Giving is Living,
Life is Eternal and Love is its Essence.

—Owen R. Lovejoy.

Children's Gardens

Each child in Vancouver is invited to enter the children's garden competition of the City Beautiful Association, regulations for which were drafted on Friday night by the Domestic Garden Committee of the organization. Children desiring to compete for the prizes must file their entries by June 15, and blanks for that purpose may be obtained from the teachers in the schools or from Mr. W. E. Payne, secretary of the organization at the Board of Trade rooms. The entry forms must be countersigned by parents.

Prizes Offered

Two cups donated by the city aldermen will be awarded this year, one for vegetable growing and one for flower growing, together with four other graded prizes in each ward. In addition to the prizes, each winner of a prize will be given an appropriate certificate, and a further certificate will be given each competitor not successful in winning a prize.

Conditions.

Children from 8 to 16 years old are eligible to enter the contest, and those between the ages of 8 years and 12 years will be allowed to avail themselves of assistance, but those more than 12 years old must work alone. Flower gardens and vegetable gardens will be judged in two classes, and the entry blanks must tell whether the competitor will contest for the prize for flower gardening, vegetable gardening, or both.

Competent judges appointed by the association will visit the gardens twice each season, and in making their decision will take into consideration the varios conditions for which the competitors have worked. The following points will be considered in making the awards: the nature of the soil, exposure of garden, variety of specimens used, and the design and artistic effect of the whole.

The committee recommends that a record be kept of the time of planting and maturing of plants, character of soil and difficulties overcome, weather conditions, weeds, insects and diseases, in order that the data may be available for future reference.

Policeman Shot Near Waterfront

Constable James Archibald is Killed Tuesday Night in Running Fight With Burglars.

Three shots fired in quick succession broke the stillness of the night at 12:40 o'clock Tuesday night, two of which pierced the heart of Police Constable James Archibald, whose body was found at 9:30 Wednesday morning in a vacant lot on Powell Street, directly opposite the B. C. Distillery Company, by Sergeant Campbell.

At 12:30 he had gone to 2132 Powell Street in answer to a call. This call it was thought was simply to investigate an affray. It was stated that he telephoned a few minutes after this reporting that he was answering this call, but that his usual half-hourly call which should have come in a few minutes afterwards was not rung in. Being a steady man no anxiety was felt at that time, but as the minutes passed and grew into hours, it was feared that the constable had met with foul play, and immediately members of the force were sent out to search for him.

It was not until 9:30 o'clock that it was learned that the offices of the Hastings Shingle Manufacturing Company had been broken into and ransacked. Then the plot began to unfold and it was soon learned that in a gallant effort to carry out his duty the brave officer had met a terrible death.

Archibald's revolver was missing from the scabbard and had evidently been used for the bloody deed. His clothes were torn and he had been handled and mauled violently, evidently in his desperate attempt to secure possession of the death dealing weapon. This is the only clue that the police have at present to the murderer.

The body was found directly opposite the B. C. Distillery by Sergeant Campbell, but the actual shooting took place on the north side of the street near the mill. The alleged murderers had evidently dragged the body to the vacant lot about 30 or 40 feet away from the crime.

The deceased had the reputation of being steady and was a total abstainer. He lived in the 100 block Harris Street and leaves a wife and two children. His beat was on Powell Street and he was on duty when the dastardly act occurred. He joined the city force on April 17, 1912, and was popular with his fellow officers. He was 27 years of age and had served five years on the Lanarkshire constabulary, also 18 months on the Winnipeg force prior to coming to Vancouver. He was ranked as third class on the local force.

POLICE ARE INSPECTED AND RECEIVE MEDALS

The annual inspection of the Vancouver police force by the Mayor and the Police Commissioners, took place Tuesday afternoon at 6 o'clock in the Drill Hall. There were present 90 patrolmen and 12 sergeants, under the command of Sergeant-Major Heritage. Mayor Baxter in making a few remarks before the presentation of the medals, complimented the men on their fine appearance. In addressing the mounted men under Sergeant Long, His Worship said that Vancouver had reason to be proud of her police force. The horses are fit, well-trained and are handled well. He said he would like to see about eight more horses and men added to the mounted squad, and hoped it would be possible next year. After the inspection Mayor Baxter presented medals to the members who had earned them through meritorious conduct.

WOMEN CLIMB GROUSE MT.

Thirty-five out of a party of forty-one young women, members of the Vancouver Y. W. C. A., under the leadership of Miss Anderson and guided by members of the British Columbia Mountaineering Club, on Friday night of last week climbed Grouse Mountain and watched the sun rise over the hills on the morning of Victoria Day. The start was made at 7 o'clock Friday evening and the top of the mountain was reached at 3.30 the next morning after a long tramp through the snow.

Rev. John W. Woodside, pastor of Mount Pleasant Presbyterian Church, left Monday morning with Mrs. Woodside for the Presbyterian congress and general assembly at Toronto.

The Merchants' Publicity Campaign

The grand publicity campaign which is now being run by the local merchants is proving a big success. The pretty Shetland pony and cart, which is to be presented at the close of the contest, is creating much interest, especially amongst the children. Being gentle and quiet, "Teddy" draws large crowds of boys and girls at the school playgrounds every day, and not a few of the "grownups" have expressed a strong desire that they may be the ones to get the pony and cart at the close of the campaign. It is fully realized that all have an equal opportunity in this contest, for it simply means that they must deal where they get the ballots; and in several cases the young people have a number of their friends working for them also.

The places where ballots are given with every twenty-five cent purchase are as follows: Vernon's Grain and Feed Store, 255 Broadway east, phone Fair. 186; Mount Pleasant Shoe Repairing, Mr. P. CONQUEST OF MT. HANOVER.

This Peak Ascended for the Frst Time on Saturday.

A party consisting of W. A. D. Munday, B. Hanafin and Edward Le Page, under the leadership of Mr. Munday, successfully ascended Mount Hanover for the first time. The height of the mountain, recorded by aneroid barometer, is 5,966 feet. The approach was by way of the Capilano Valley, the time occupied being three days, including sixteen and a half hours in the actual ascent of the peak.

Mount Hanover is shown on the Admiralty charts. It is fifteen miles from Vancouver, at the headwaters of Capilano River, and about two miles from the nearest point on Howe Sound. It is a very prominent feature of the landscape from Crown Mountain, the Lions, and other well-known peaks.

All the prominent local peaks have now been climbed, so that a chapter in the history of mountaineering in Vancouver is closed with the conquest of Mount Hanover.

Methodist Conference

An outstanding feature of the Conference was the reports adopted, of which we here give extracts.

This Conference requests the Provincial Government to make such amendments to the Municipal Elections Act as will prevent the filling up the lists of electors with names of persons who are not bona fide residents of the municipality.

This Conference is of the opinion that in view of the existence of Social Vice in this Province we regard it as an immediate and pressing duty of the Provincial Legislature to provide a Reformatory or House of Correction for fallen women, to which such offenders against the law could be committed, preferably under indeterminate sentence.

We would further recommend that the Methodist Department of Temperance and Moral Reform be asked to institute or co-operate with the Presbyterians in instituting one or more Rescue Homes in the Province of British Columbia.

We also recommend that efforts be made in all our important ocean ports to organize institutions for sailors, where pleasant entertainment and recreation can be provided for seafaring men during their stay on land.

Social Vice.

The Conference is of the opinion that a comprehensive policy regarding Social Vice which is in line with best social judgment will include:

The education o fthe people, especially of our children and young people concerning the sacredness of our physical life.

The resolute insistance of a single standard of morals for men and women, both socially and before the law.

The betterment of those economic and social conditions which aggrevate the temptation towards sensual wrong doing.

Commercialized vice in all its hideous forms being a sin against God, a wrong against home and a menace to society, the state should set itself persistently and vigorously to its suppression.

In regard to the Social Vice, your Committee regrets to have to report that from two sections of this Province information is before us as to the existence of conditions which call for immediate action on the part of all citizens who have the well-being of this Province at heart.

In the City of Vancouver there is a recognized area of segregated vice which seems to enjoy immunity from the Criminal Code of Canada.

In the Kootenay District there are no less than fourteen cities and towns in which the Social Vice is either segregated or tolerated.

Gambling.

We deplore the fact that in this Province forms of gambling have been permitted to continue, notwithstanding that they are forbidden to do so by the Criminal Code of Canada and are successfully suppressed in other Provinces of this Dominion. We refer especially to the betting at horse races, the engaging in "sweepstakes" and "raffles," as well as the permission of mechanical devices, which are essentially forms of gambling. In this matter much responsibility is thrown upon the Police Commissioners. It is therefore important that men chosen to this office should be only men known to uphold the Criminal Code of Canada.

Equality of Franchise.

Whereas in the development of democratic institutions each extension of the franchise has been accompanied with great good in placing the responsibilities of Government upon a larger number of citizens, and whereas the granting of the franchise to some women in municipal government has been a distinct advantage in the administration of municipal affairs, we are of the opinion that a further extension of the franchise, so as to permit women to vote in all elections on the same terms as men, would not only be just and right, but if it could be speedily obtained it would greatly aid in the moral uplift of social and political affairs for which we are all working.

Enforcement of Laws.

Reports have come to us of the non-enforcement of the existing liquor laws in various parts of the Province, and we find in tracing the responsibility, that it is in a large measure due to some License Commissioners who are not in sympathy with a thorough enforcement of the Liquor Act. We believe it is the duty of the Government to maintain the majesty of law and we think that the principle governing the appointment of all commissioners should be to choose men who are in sympathy with a fair enforcement of law.

U. S. PRESIDENTS.

Of the twenty-seven Presidents of the United States, fourteen were lawyers in thir early days, and nineteen became lawyers before their election. Seventeen, including the present incumbent were college men. The others occupied stations that offered equal opportunities for a return totheir vocations. In the present generation seven Presidents were lawyers. Of these, four—Hayes, Arthur, Cleveland and Harrison—returned to the practice of the law. Mr. Cleveland, however, soon withdrew from his profession and became active in other directions, notably in connection with Princeton University.

Seattle—John J. Dale, 50 years old, was fatally injured by an explosion Monday, when he attempted to solder a leaking gasolene tank aboard his launch May Dale, lying at the foot of Twenty-eighth street northwest.

The explosion was heard for several blocks, and the noise brought a number of employees of Hagen's boat building yards to the waterside. Dale way lying near his engine unconscious and flames were breaking out in the stern, between the engine and gasolene tank.

FIRST MOTOR CAR TO ENTER TOWN OF YALE.

To Mr. Ed. Sperling, superintendent of the B. C. Electric Railway at New Westminster belongs the distinction of having driven the first automobile to enter the historic town of Yale in the Fraser Canyon. On the evening of May 24, the mountain walls surrounding the romantically-situated old town reverberated with the echoes of, to them, a new sound, the blasts from an automobile horn.

The people of Yale had been advised that Mr. Sperling was coming. Accompanying him were his brother, Mr. F. W. Sperling, travelling representative of the C. P. R. freight department, Vancouver, and Mr. Reginald Prenter, also of Vancouver. The performance was made in a five-passenger Hupmobile, and some desperate hill climbing was done.

The party left New Westminster on the morning of the 24th inst. and reached Yale at 7:30 that evening. After leaving Chilliwack every one spoken to volunteered the information that an insurmountable difficulty lay in the way in the shape of a hill over Jones Mountain, the description of which, given by the last person to, a Chinese rancher, came nearest to being correct, he pointing straight up when asked how it went. This hill is half-way between Chilliwack and Hope.

The Fraser River was crossed at Hope on the government ferry, and from there to Yale the journey was made over the old Cariboo Road. At Yale Mr. Ed. Stout, the famous old Cariboo miner, was given his first ride in an automobile. He said that May 24 was an eventful day for him, as he had also that day received from the Premier of the province, as a compliment, his fifty-fourth mining license.

BY JOHN MARCH

Sir Thomas dropped into it, thankful for the substantial support it afforded his trembling limbs.

"Can you bring to mind, Farley, the day we discussed Judith's infatuation for you? Do you remember," he proceeded, as Paul bowed in answer, "do you remember me saying I would never allow a daughter of mine to marry a man in your position, of your social status, and precarious antecedents?"

Paul, leaning on the writing-table staring at him, bowed again.

"Well, I retract that statement. If you have the least regard for Judith, a spark of feeling for her that she can fan into a flame, I shall be willing, proud, pleased, to welcome you as my son-in-law.

"No; don't answer on the spur of the moment; take time to consider, to inspect the advantages accruing from such a position. You are ambitious, you have your eyes on a Ministerial secretaryship, but my influence can carry you considerably beyond that. I have found out who supplied the 'Times' with those half-dozen articles which caused that furore; consequently, my son-in-law and the man who wrote them is competent to fill any post the country will be willing and anxious to offer him. I wish to be quite plain, straight, and honest with you. I had hoped this mania of Judith's would wear itself out in time. A while back I thought she intended to content herself with Pelham, but the unfortunate relapse, this recrudescence of the malady, has swept her off her balance. Still, given what she desires, I believe the child will be as mentally healthy as you or I, and Judith really is a nice, pretty, loveable girl. This interview is somewhat humiliating to me, and goes against the grain, Farley, but I promised Judith I would make this concession; I promised I would do my utmost to induce you to propose to her. It came to pass like this: I carelessly left your letter about, I don't know where, but Judith found it and hit upon a bold, questionable stroke. Not knowing of your sudden return, she went yesterday to the 'Pendennis,' ostensibly to compromise both herself and you. She left a note saying what she had done, and that she was sure you would save her good name. My wife went to town to-day to fetch her, with the news you were here, and a message from me that if she returned I would do all in my power to bring you two together. Will you look at the proposal all round, and tell me if you can meet my wishes?"

"But they are not your wishes, nor are they mine. I am sorry, sir, you should have been harassed, coerced, and driven into making me this generous offer; I feel honored, sir, I—"

"You are wrong, Farley; it's my wish as well as Judith's. I like you, in fact, the feeling goes beyond mere liking, and I should be exceedingly proud of you, I am sure. My wife feels as if you were an elder boy—she liked you from the first—and as a family we—we would each do our part to make you—"

"You have been so good to me, sir," he said earnestly. "I honor, I esteem, I respect you beyond measure. I am so grateful for all your and Lady Hargrave's kindness that I would sacrifice a great deal to set your mind at rest, but I cannot marry Miss Hargrave, I—"

"I would make it worth your while, Farley.'

"I am sure you would; you are the best husband, father, and master that ever breathed, and it hurts me acutely to hear you ask for what I know I cannot give."

"This was my last hedge," he said, pathetically; "I've taken it and come cloud against a high blank wall. God help us all if Judith fulfils her ghastly threat."

"Don't take it so much to heart, sir; don't let the trouble get a hold on you; don't let it make an old man of you," Paul implored, watching the tears ooze between Sir Thomas's fingers. "Things won't be as bad as you think; we shall be able to find some way of escape."

"Can't you do it, Farley? My dear boy, you shall make your own terms."

"I have none to make, and if I had I should leave them in your hands, knowing in any case you would do what was just and right."

"You won't marry her, Farley?"

"Sir, I would serve you on my knees with my last breath; but I cannot, indeed, I cannot do what you ask. But there is one thing I can do—I can leave if you think it wise and wish it."

"I think it would be wise, but I don't wish it," he said, rising and walking up and down. "I ought to send you away; I ought to have done it long ago, because I am less able to do without you now than I was then. I must think it over, I—"

"Mr. Fleming is anxious for me to return to town. I came back to-night to ask permission. Suppose I stay away until you have had time to think it over, and have decided whether to have me back again."

"Perhaps that will be best; I am quite at a loss; I don't feel able to judge; there is so much for and against."

"Meanwhile ,don't worry yourself with a single figure, sir; I can attend to things just the same. It will only make a difference of a few hours' delay, and if you want to see me, a wire to say you are coming will prevent my being out of the way."

"Thank you, Farley," he said, looking at him regretfully, and holding out his hand. "I wish I knew of some inducement."

"The very fact of knowing you wished it would be sufficient inducement if the thing were practicable or possible," he returned, gripping his hand, "I wish I had a quarter of the respect and affection for your daughter that I have for you, sir."

They both smiled, looked at one another with moist eyes, and turned away.

Paul packed his valise in the morning and went to London by the first up train after breakfast. Leaning back in a second-class carriage, a cigarette in his mouth, and scanning the theatrical announcements in the "Morning Post," he resolved to take Hunter's advice and endeavor to stifle this additional trouble under a fund of pleasurable excitement. Accordingly he decided to visit the Haymarket and see Madame Bernhardt in "La Tosca" the next night.

CHAPTER XXIV.

La Tosca

Rowena Wycherly, deliriously happy, lay smiling in a velvet fauteuil, her voluptuous beauty enhanced by the negligence of a tea-gown, which was in itself a charm.

At her desire they occupied a private room at the Cecil, and Rowena was judiciously employing the twilight by rolling cigarettes for Hare, who lounged opposite to her, his satin-slippered feet on the rail of the fender. She was radiant with health and beauty, with lambent life and laughter, her heart tingling with keenest thrills of love and anticipated pleasure. A delicious perfume exuded with her every movement; it floated away on the warm atmosphere, carrying an ethereal essence of her living, breathing beauty to the soul of the quiet man watching her.

With the advent of the waiter, the afternoon tea, and the glare of the electric light, she rose, pushed her chair back, and shook out the folds of her silken skirts.

"Tea, darling?" she asked, caressingly, casting a handful of cigarettes into his lap as the door closed.

Hare stood up, threw the remainder of his cigar into the fire and stretched himself lazily.

"I never saw you smoke a cigar, Paul, until yesterday—or the day before was it, or the day before that?—I mean the day we were married, dear?"

"It was the day before that, Rowena. It is difficult to know what has become of this week; we have let the days and hours race ahead or lag behind just as they pleased; we have taken no account of time; we have just breathed, lived and loved."

"Do you care for a cup, Paul?" she asked, laying a hand on his and poising the teapot in mid air with the other

"Not much," he answered, smiling; "but I'll have some if you want me to be sociable.'

She set the teapot down, sprang up and moved the table into the centre of the room.

"You don't care for it, dearest, and I am not going to make a martyr of you. I would rather have one midget of a kiss from you than all the tea and dainties in Christendom."

She pushed him back into his seat, dropped gracefully at his feet, curled her arms round his knees, and turned her wondrous face to him.

"How I love you!" she whispered; "how I love you! Paul—sometimes I can't breathe; I feel stifled, suffocated, with the mountain of love on my heart."

He bent his head, put his lips to hers, and kept them there in one long-drawn-out soulful kiss.

"You have changed," she said, with subtle perception, "and I know the day, the hour, the moment, the change came."

"Tell me, you witch," he said, stroking her gleaming hair.

"'Twas the night you came from town, the night you brought the ring; the moon shone full in your face and I saw—"

"Well?" with a tender pleasure, "what did you see, sweet?"

"I don't know—it was not love; it was something that changed the expression of your cold inscrutable eyes. I saw them glitter as if there was a flame at the back which grew stronger and brighter and fiercer each moment."

He laughed softly, drew her closer, and rested his head on hers.

"It was love, Rowena, love that had lain dormant in its rudimentary embryo state for weeks, and you, you sweet fay, you witnessed its heavenly birth!"

"I believe it," she cried, passionately, clinging to him with all her strength; "I do, I will, I must believe it; you wouldn't deceive me, Paul?"

"My darling! In our close intimate relationship could I deceive you? You have surely divined the feeling I have for you? You must feel it in my touch, see it in my eyes, and hear it in my voice; say, dear heart, that you know it's there."

"Yes, I know it; I know it now; it's strange, it seems miraculous, but it is certainly there. Paul—dearest, the knowledge, the happiness, the joy, I think will kill me!"

She gave a sighing sob, as if fatigued by the vehemence of her emotion. He held her in his arms and soothed her with a patient gentleness, with tender epithets and fond endearments. At length he charmed away the oppression, the intolerable sense of a bliss that was half fear. She grew calm anon smiling and gay, and gradually soared up into her normal, bold, daring brilliancy.

"Shall we dine here or abroad?" he asked, lighting one of the cigarettes she had rolled.

"Here, unless you prefer a change of cuisine?"

"I? No, I am satisfield—quite—and afterwards, Rowena, where shall we go?"

"Look in the paper, darling," she said, coaxingly, "and pick out something nice. We have been to the theatre three nights running, so perchance we have exhausted the best, the tip-top pieces."

"I don't think so," he said, drawing a shapely forefinger down the theatrical column. "Why, sweetheart, you said you must see Sarah Bernhardt—here we are—'La Tosca'!"

She clapped her hands in the old familiar childish way.

"Let us have a box; just we two; a dear, sweet little gilded box quite near the stage. I want to see the divine Sarah close, and I want to be alone with you, — Telephone, dear; go down and telephone for the nearest box to the stage."

He laughed, threw the paper down, went outside, and stepped into the elevator, while Rowena, in her ecstatic delight, raised her trailing skirts and revolved around the room, pirouetting gracefully before the pier-glass at the end of the room.

"What shall I wear?" she asked, waltzing up to him on his return; "shall I put on the frock that I wore at the Masked Ball?"

"Yes," he said, catching her to him, "that was exquisite. I can't recall its exact shade or style, but the ensemble was exceedingly artistic; it suited you to perfection."

They dined table d'hôte, and afterwards a private brougham conveyed them to the theatre. Rowena was wonderful in a confection by M. Felix, consisting of vapory lace over peach blossom silk, and Hare, drawing the ermine cloak higher upon her bare shoulders, marvelled at the vital glow which seemed to radiate from every pore of her velvet skin.

She caught his arm as they alighted and ascended to the vestibule. The action was impulsive, and her cloak dropped to the ground. Hare stooped to recover the garment. He replaced it, smiled, and passed on, but the trifling mishap attracted the attention of the waiting crowd, and all eyes followed Rowena's swaying form.

"Ach! Himmel!" exclaimed a tall Jewish-looking cosmopolitan, one of a gesticulating knot of well-dressed habitués. "Ciel! Vot a grand conception! vot a magnificent woman!"

Hare heard it, and looked jealously down on the corn-colored head.

"It's yours," she said, lifting her face in consonance with his disturbing start, "the beauty, the magnificence, the conception, whatever there is to admire and to enjoy in me is all yours, Paul—on this planet and through all the divers phases of our dual existences."

He pressed the arm clinging to his, murmured something about his queen of beauty, and then gallantly handed her into the compact box next the stage, and looked around upon the dense, massed throng.

She bent forward and gazed upon the sea of faces beneath her, and presently touched Hare's knee with her fan. He had drawn himself within the shadow of the curtain. His heart palpitated, he felt strange and weak. The woman's beauty was overwhelming, it affected his senses like the faint but powerful fragrance of hot-house blooms, and the weird, sobbing music from the orchestra appealed too forcefully, and helped to bewilder him.

"You look pale," she said, forgetful of the reason she desired his attention. "What is the matter with you?"

"Indigestion," he answered, smiling. "I ate my dinner too quickly."

"I am sorry; you won't enjoy the play. Would a cigarette between the acts help it, darling?"

She bent forward, engrossed. Hare became unmindful of his indisposition, and when, later, the curtain dropped, made no attempt to withdraw and test the proposed remedy. Instead, he leaned back in his seat, his hand in Rowena's lap, discussing and challenging the merits and demerits of the remarkable scene.

The night wore on, the gifted actress was at her best. Her lover was being tortured in an inner chamber; she, barred outside, mad with grief, impotent rage, and vibrating with the pain wrung from the racked man, smote with maniacal frenzy upon the panels of the door. The cries, the prayers, the entreaties, the terrible despairing, agonising sobs, echoed and re-echoed through Rowena's head and round the region of her heart. She turned once to look for Hare's hand, and, grasping it, refastened her great, tearless eyes upon the crushed, kneeling woman.

With the deafening plaudits the curtain dropped, the tension snapped, the strain was over. She lay back quivering, listening to the storm of applause, her fan before her face, her eyes closed.

"Shall I get you some wine, dearest?" Hare asked, stroking her inert hand.

"Wine? No; look! I am myself again! Oh, Paul—" she put her hand to her heart, "it was a cruel poignant scene. I felt, love, as if the pain were yours."

"He laughed lightly, pinched her ear, and patted her shoulder; then he stooped over her tenderly, excused himself, and left the box to procure a breath of purer air. He was not absent long; a few minutes sufficed to cool himself and drain a tiny glass of liqueur; indeed, he was back before she missed him; before she knew of his return.

Rowena was leaning forward, her arms on the edge of the box, looking down on the panorama of moving figures in the stalls below. He took his seat beside her, and strove to gain her attention, and failing, he laid a gentle admonishing hand on her arm, and spoke to her. There was no response; she was mute, deaf, blind, dead to everything save the wild doubt, the horrible amazement, the repulsive riddle that held her spellbound. With

Nobody Knows

Just what's the matter with her. Even the doctors seem puzzled, and they are not doing her any good.

How often we hear statements like the above. Are you in such a condition If so, you should consult a Chiropractor. Have you friend or relation who is in such a state? If so, you should tell him to see a Chiropractor.

A Chiropractor knows that all disease is inco-ordination between the various parts of the body—lack of harmony between the brain and the tissue cells. This is caused by pressure of nerves. The Chiropractor by a skilful movement of his hands on the spine of the sick person removes the pressure. The nerves which have been dormant by reason of the pressure again become active, and Nature by this means effects a cure.

The Chiropractor never claims to cure. All he does is to remove the pressure and thus open the door for Nature to do her wonderful work.

The Chiropractor never worries himself or the patient by seeking to give a name to the trouble. The trouble is simply an effect for which there must be a cause. "Every effect has a cause." So the Chiropractor finds the cause, removes it, and then in the ordinary course of things the effect should cease.

There is a magazine published in Toronto, named "The Canadian Chiropractor." If you would like a copy, ask for one at the addres below. It is free for the asking, and will tell you things worth knowing.

suspended breath Hare's eyes traveled in the wake of her frozen stare, and there, at the back of the stalls, in the middle of the front row of the pit, the light full on his dark, refined face, was Paul Farley. He was standing for a change of posture to ease his cramped limbs, unconscious of aught else save boredom, his face upturned, his glasses glittering, his great melancholy eyes roving round the house in a casual unseeing manner.

Hare could have struck him dead as he stood there, pale and artistically handsome; he could have bitten his own heart in two in the insensate rage that consumed him. The meeting was ill-timed, preposterous, stupefying; he had meant to have told her himself later on when he had won his way with her past all redemption. It seemed an eternity before she could tear her eyes from that slim, prominent figure to rest them on his face with a wide, steady stare.

They travelled backwards and forwards, deliberately and evenly, from the man's scholarly visage in the pit to his own mock likeness, as if she would read his very soul. She was carefully comparing them while he sat still, composed, a veritable Giant Despair under her scrutiny, the hot tide of life seething and surging through his swollen veins.

A joyous burst of music came from the orchestra, played with wild vivacity. He started in nervous affright, shivered with a moral as well as a physical chill, and looked anxiously at Rowena. She was lying back in her fauteuil grasping her jewelled fan, her beautiful face white and stricken. Hare saw she had solved the riddle and lay writhing, half swooning, with horror. He touched her gently, and she opened her eyes. He raised his forefinger and laid it warningly on his lips.

"Shall we go?" he whispered.

She rose and gathered her cloak about her. He drew her cold, unyielding hand through his arm, led her along the passage down into the turmoil of the street below. Hailing a passing hansom, he helped her—almost lifted—her in, gave the name of the hotel, and took his place beside her.

Rowena sat upright, a beautiful statue of frozen snow encased in a stony crust of impenetrable sensibility, the wind blowing rudely in her face, a lurid gleam in her hazel eyes. Hare was in mortal dread of he knew not what. The drive was agony to him; an intense ordeal. The horse, impatient for a headlong rush, took them swiftly; but short, sharp, and soon over as it was, the memory of the silent journey was indelibly printed on his brain, and stayed with him for all time.

CHAPTER XXV.

Rowena's Treachery

"Who are you?" she demanded, with quiet dignity, the privacy of their room reached and the door secured against obsequious waiters.

He laid his hat upon an octagonal table and opened his coat as if oppressed by its weight.

"My name is Hare," he said, speaking in his natural voice, which was lower and more pleasantly toned; "Austin Hare. My history lies in a nutshell. My father, an artist, died young; my grandfather, a clergyman, died poor. I commenced life as a lawyer's clerk, and, despite difficulties and adverse circumstances, I have been journalist, actor, editor, since and until I met you was combining all three with the additional amusement of a private detective agency."

"And you have dared to marry me?"

"No; that is exactly what I have not dared, but I desire to do so."

"I am neither Paul Farley's wife—nor yours?"

"No; but I can easily make you mine, Rowena. Will you go to church with me again?"

She sank back into the fauteuil, where she had lain in her exulting beauty a few hours previously. Pale and grave she certainly was, with something of a stunned expression in her eyes. Nevertheless, he felt surprised at her lack of wrath, at her calm temper of mind, which shut out from him the real working of her feelings and the trend of her manifold nature. He crossed the room, and knelt down at her side.

"Rowena," he said, his hand on hers, "I love you, and you know it's true, because these last few days you have let down your plummet-line and fathomed the depths of my heart. You know it's true, because with one wife and another you have experienced the whole crescendo of my passion for you. I can satisfy that untamed heart of yours; I swear I can make you happy. The past four days go to prove I am not speaking without substantial reason; without reliable, though stolen, knowledge. Honestly, Rowena, few men could live up to such high pressure. Paul Farley could not, for one. But my nature, like yours, is complex; my temperament high-pitched and abnormally strung. Dear heart! forg t the pain, the resentment, and—smile!"

She smiled, sat up , and drew away her hand.

"Mr. Hare, I refuse to—complete—to go through the ceremony again with you."

"Why?" he asked, with a beating heart.

"Because you are not the man I intended to marry, you are not the man I love."

"But I am the man who loves you. Come, Rowena, be rational; don't throw away the substance for the shadow. Farley no more cares for you than I for the drab now passing in the street below. To appease you, in order not to unnecessarily distress you, I will continue this farce, this personality of Farley, as long as you wish I will keep as I am. It blinded you, Rowena, and now, for Heaven's sake, shut your eyes to this evening's mischief, and be blind again."

"I was not blinded, at least not wholly duped," she burst forth; "I felt the difference, the coarser contact, a little while, and I should have pierced the sham. I was trustfully unobservant, totally unsuspicious. I never dreamed of fraud; but now, having held up the mirror to the real thing I see the baser metal. I can hear the artificial ring of the false. Your voice, Mr.—Hare," her blazing eyes fastened on his face, and slid gradually down his person, "your nose, the curve of your chin, your shoulders, your nails—"

She flung herself back, and laughed peal after peal, of what would have been contagious laughter had Hare been in the mood for merriment.

"Rowena," he said penitently, winding his arms around her, "punish me, give me a sound rating, give me a good trouncing, abuse me to your heart's content; I think I deserve it, although the temptation was great; but take me back, dear; forgive me and marry me."

"I am not going to upbraid you, Mr. Hare. I simply want to understand the tragedy of my present situation. Who suggested, who arranged this diabolical stratagem?"

"Mr. Fleming," he said, keeping his hand on her shoulder, "as I have already more than inferred, Rowena, Farley dislikes you, and he appealed to Fleming for advice, for assistance to combat you. They approached Graham on the subject of a substitute for Farley, and he recommended me. I made up—the artifice was clever, come now, wasn't it, sweet? and returned with Fleming to East Weyberne. I saw you on the platform; you know the rest. It was your fault, you witch; you took me by storm; you asked me to marry you, and I—well, I would have risked a great deal rather than comply."

She shrank back in her chair, and looked up at him in a forlorn, childish way that went to his heart. He was very penitent regarding his misdeeds, and as far as Farley was concerned, very jealous. He stooped and lifted her from the chair as if she were the child she would have him believe, and spoke to her in a loving, argumentative tone.

"Come Rowena, darling," he said, tilting her chin, "there's been some collusion, a little trickery about the barter, and you've been cheated out of the genuine article; still the substitute is not so spurious that you need look too closely at the chicanery of the transaction. For my own part, I think you have escaped an intolerable fate. A woman of your fervid temperament, your unrestrained passions, tied to a prosaic, cold-blooded fellow like Farley, would have been nothing less than a tragedy; it would have been the devil's own cunning, the finishing stroke to that gentleman's whirligig in his demoniacal festive sport. Come, sweetheart, give your beauteous self to me; give me the right to worship you, give me the chance, the time, and I swear I will oust Farley completely from your heart."

He looked down at the puerile expression on her face and kissed her roughly. His heart beat to suffocation; every pulse throbbed. He felt he was going forward, gaining ground. He told himself he was surely, if slowly, making his way with long, advancing strides.

"I am tired," she said, plaintively, letting her head droop to his shoulder.

"I am sure you are, sweetheart," he returned tenderly; "tell me you will marry me, and then you shall go to bed."

"Yes, I think I will marry you," she said, thoughtfully, drilling his buttonhole with her finger.

"As soon as I can make the necessary arrangements?"

"Whenever you come for me I shall be ready."

"Come for you." He paused. "Dearest, I'll stay down here if you like; but it's too late, I can't find another hotel to-night."

She put her arms round his neck, drew his head down, and kissed him voluntarily. He returned the unsolicited embrace with interest, wrapped her in the ermine cloak, and opened the door for her to pass from the room.

"Poor little woman!" he muttered, sinking into the fauteuil Rowena had just vacated. "By Jove, it was a sudden beastly blow. She will get over it, though; she's already riding in that direction. Upon my soul, I believe the puss was more than half inclined to forgive me from the first."

He lighted a cigar, put his feet on an opposite chair, and laid back in quiet, ruminative enjoyment.

"Upon my word," he mused, "she has behaved well. She was a little bowled over and scared at first, and no wonder; but there were no hysterics, no scene, no public demonstration of domestic infelicity. Fleming can say what he likes, but Rowena has plenty of good common-sense, and I should certainly say a perfectly refined conception of the proprieties in general. The first feeling of stunned horror having worn off, she seemed to realize the suction of fate under the current of social life, together with the desirability of keeping to me. Of course, she could have gone back to Farley had she chosen, but she didn't choose, which goes to prove I have established some sort of irresistible heart control.

"Bless the dear woman. I love her maddening beauty; I love the high tension of her nervous system. Her wild vivacity freshens me; it suits me. It makes me feel like a healthy young boy out on the moor, the wind creeping over the hills straight from the sea, longing to rough it, braced to meet extremes, whether it be the scorch of the sun or the chill of the frost. Fleming was wrong, prejudicially wrong; I can stem the torrent of that undammed stream; I have partially altered its course; presently—" He looked at the glowing end of his cigar and smiled. "Beautiful Rowena, beguiling woman, darling wife; your soul is sufficiently sensitive; you answer to my touch; sweetheart, you remind me of Mimosa!"

Thus, smoking innumerable cigars, and pouring himself out as to another self, the night was far spent before he could tear himself from the fascination of his misty philosophy and take note of time.

"Half-past two! What a vigil! And no beauty sleep! I'll put a lump of coal on the fire, and then see if I can get a few hours' sleep."

He stretched himself on the well-padded couch, slipped a couple of cushions under his head, and shut his eyes with the determination of obtaining the refreshing, much-needed repose. He wooed the coquettish jade long and patiently, and when at last she consented to grant him a little peace, it was but a poor kind of fitful, feverish sleep. Over fatigue and excitement lends an unenviable activity to the brain, as Hare found to his cost. He dozed and dreamed, and dreamed and dozed, partially awake, yet troubled the while by a nauseating nightmare. When gradually the doze glided into a slight drowse he became conscious of a curious sound, which rather appalled him. In his sleepy state he set himself to work to discover its origin, and was amused after an appreciable waste of energy to find it proceeded from himself—he was snoring.

The funny little incident had entirely roused him. He was wide awake now, and gazing beneath his eyelashes at a stream of light across the carpet, shed by a powerful limelight from outside the window, and idly watching, he beheld a black line creep slowly over the broad, white band. His detective instincts instantly became alert; he was curious, interested, and shifting his furtive eyes, he saw the phenomenon had been engendered by the opening of the room door. Ere many heartbeats had escaped him a figure, the figure of a woman in a trailing garment, crossed the white belt and crept stealthily towards his couch. She bent her head over him and listened. He dared not raise his lowered lids, but he knew her; he knew the impetuous breathing, the subtle perfume she exhaled, and waited uneasily for the solution of her solicitude.

When the smart drummer got off the train at Hickville, his attention was attracted by an ancient cab between the shafts of which was propped the worst looking nag he had ever seen. An old negro was dozing on the box.

"Hey," yelled the drummer, "ain't you afraid your horse will shy at an auto and run away?"

"No, sah," replied the jehu. "Dis hawss is got sense. He don't shy at no automobeels. Why, he didn't even shy at railroad trains when dey fust come out."

FARM NOTES

A NEW FORESTRY BULLETIN

"Forest Conditions in the Rocky Mountain Forest Reserve" is the title of a pamphlet (Bulletin No. 33) just issued by the Forestry Branch of the Department of the Interior.

It contains the result of investigations made by Mr. T. W. Wright, B. F., on the forests of the southern part of the reserve, which extends along the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains from the international boundary for some distance north of the latitude of Edmonton.

The bulletin treats of the present general condition of the forest of the reserve and of the influence on them of various factors such as their height above sea-level, the number of trees per acre, etc. The effect of lumbering, fire and other agencies on the forest is then discussed, and, after a short scientific discussion of the different species and the manner in which they are growing up to form the new forest, the management of timber-cutting operations is considered. Among the topics treated under this head are the disposal of the brush, the method of marking trees for cutting and the cost of maintaining forestry methods. A short consideration of the practice on the U. S. National Forests in Montana, where the forests are very similar in character to those of Southern Alberta is given, and the bulletin concludes with a number of technical forestry tables. The pamphlet is illustrated with over a dozen half-tone illustrations. The study is being continued this summer.
