DUNCAN ROSS

Presents Government Side of Issue in Federal Campaign.

Makes Serious Charges Against Bowser.

Senator Bostock also Speaks.

Before a large gathering of voters and others, among whom were a considerable number of ladies, Duncan Ross, Liberal candidate for Yale-Cariboo, and Senator Bostock dealt with the issues that are before the public in this campaign.

F. H. Latimer, president of the Liberal association, acted as chairman and in a few remarks introduced the speakers.

Senator Bostock first addressed the meeting speaking for about twenty minutes. He commented upon the return of the Liberal party due to its policy of development since coming into power. He touched upon the construction of the G. T. P. and the establishment of a closer steamship service with the Old Country as factors in the development of the country. He could not understand the criticism by the Opposition of the cost of construction of the G. T. P., considering the immense benefit to be derived from the road. The country had enjoyed a period of prosperity ever since the Liberals had come into power and the outlook for the future was very bright.

Previous to 1906 there had been no railway commission in Canada, and since its establishment the commission had done much to secure better rates. The commission had since been enlarged to include telegraph and telephone lines.

Mr. Bostock then touched upon the postal service, stating that, although the rates had been reduced upon letters and newspapers, there was still a surplus in that department. Rural mail delivery was being introduced in the east, and the system would be extended.

The Government had done a great deal for the benefit of the mineral industry by the establishment of a department of mines. The resources of the province were now receiving advertising that would undoubtedly result in the bringing of capital into the province.

Mr. Ross in rising to speak paid a tribute to the ladies present adding that he only wished that the ladies could vote as he knew they would all vote for him. He had been asked by the ladies of the W. C. T. U. to make certain pledges but he had refused to do so as he did not believe in pledging himself immediately before an election.

Some time was employed by the speaker in answering remarks made by Martin Burrell. Mr. Burrell had said that he had neglected his duty to his constituents when the tariff, including that on fruit, was being revised, by leaving Ottawa and taking part in the provincial campaign. This was incorrect, as the tariff had been revised in 1906 and the provincial elections took place in 1907. Besides this he considered that results had warranted his taking part in the B. C. campaign, the number of Conservative members being reduced from seven to four.

Mr. Ross was entirely in accord with the Aylesworth Election Bill, the provisions of which the Opposition had succeeded in compelling the Government to modify. There were lots of people who should have had the opportunity of exercising the franchise, but who were not on the voters' list. The bill would have given them that opportunity. The lists were compiled at present by the officers of the provincial governments. In Manitoba, British Columbia and unorganized portions of Ontario the Dominion constituencies overlapped the provincial constituencies, the boundaries not being identical. Consequently the thin red line had to be used in cutting out names that were not entitled to vote in certain Dominion constituencies. The Aylesworth Bill would have obviated the necessity for this. He asserted that two hundred and fifty names had been struck off the voters' list at Revelstoke, and the same was true of other places. As this is a Dominion election, Mr. Ross thought the Dominion government should have the say as to who should vote.

The Opposition had stooped to a campaign of scandal and had not attempted to back up their charges by evidence. The Conservatives had the same machinery for investigation as the Liberals had before 1896, and yet the Liberals had proved their charges.

Under Conservative rule the Northwest had not been a fit place to live in, and the people were going out faster than they were coming in. Under Liberal rule the country was being rapidly settled. The Conservatives had given away 35,000,000 acres of land to the C. P. R., while the Liberals had given away none. The Conservatives had given away timber lands without money and without price. The Liberals had never sold any except to the highest tender in open market. Both Sifton and Martin had invested in lands in the Northwest under Conservative rule and had gone broke. Martin had come to B. C. broke, and if Sifton had made money, it was due to his good administration enhancing the value of his property.

Taking up the subject of better terms for this province Mr. Ross took a different view of the question from that usually advanced. He said that the Conservatives claimed that $19,000,000 was due the province from the Dominion. Since confederation, Mr. Ross stated that this province had paid into the Dominion treasury $60,000,000 and had received $65,000,000 in grants from the Dominion. Consequently, instead of the Dominion owing the province, the province was indebted to the Dominion to the sum of $5,000,000. The question, he thought, should be considered from a federal point of view, and that a larger grant from the Dominion should be sought by reason of the peculiar physical conditions of the province. How could we expect a grant for the opening up of Okanagan River, for railways, etc., if we went after it with a club. We should go after it by representing the advantages of opening up the country.

The Oriental question was one of long standing. The C. P. R. had brought Chinese into B. C. during its construction days. The Conservatives had put a head tax of fifty dollars upon those entering Canada. The Liberals had raised this to five hundred dollars per head, which meant, practically, exclusion.

Japan and Great Britain had made a treaty of war, and Canada, not wishing to hamper the Imperial government, had trusted to making friendly terms with Japan whereby emigration should be restricted. Mr. Ross then proceeded to make a vigorous attack upon W. J. Bowser, Attorney General of the province, whom he said had drawn up an agreement between Gotoh, a Japanese employment agent, and the C. P. R. to furnish the latter with fifty thousand Japanese laborers. Mr. Bowser had taken the papers from his own office and attached the name of the G. T. P. instead of the C. P. R. and had it published in the "Province." This resulted in the return of the Conservative government in the provincial election which followed. Mr. Bowser at the next session of the legislature had introduced a "Natal Act" to exclude Orientals, but instead of the word "unlawful" had written "lawful" The error was not noticed until it was too late, and then it was pretended that the error was typographical. A satisfactory arrangement had since been made with Japan through Mr. Lemieux, as agent for Canada, by which Japanese cannot come to Canada except direct from Japan, and then only in very limited numbers. The Liberal party was pledged to Oriental restriction.

In making his concluding appeal to the electors, Mr. Ross said that it was the intention of the Government to open Okanagan River for navigation, and that arrangements had been made whereby a railroad should be built from Nicola to Midway via Penticton and Carmi. Arrangements had been made whereby all the bills of the Midway-Vernon should be paid before a subsidy would be paid and this was the only thing to occasion any delay.

The meeting broke up with three cheers for Duncan Ross followed by three cheers for Martin Burrell.

The election will take place on Nov. 12.

Rifle Associations Meet.

A team of eight marksmen from the Penticton Rifle Association went to Summerland last Saturday to try their skill in a return match. Kelowna was to have sent a team down but was, unfortunately, at the last minute unable to do so.

Col. Holmes, D. O. C., of Victoria, was on the range and acted as referee. In the first match at the 200 and 500 yard ranges Summerland won by 37 points. This shows a great improvement in the Penticton team's shooting, as in the match held on the 10th October Summerland had a lead of 62 points. The scores were as follows:

	200 yards.	500 yards.
Summerland	221	215
Penticton	200	199

In a friendly match at 600 yds. Penticton beat Summerland by 15 points, the score being

Penticton	185
Summerland	170

Col. Holmes made his annual inspection of the arms, ammunition, documents and accounts of the Penticton Rifle Association on the 25th inst. After the inspection he congratulated the officers of the Association on the progress made in one season.

Liberals Returned to Power.

The latest reports give the Laurier government a majority of 48 over all, with three places yet to hear from. The returns from the various provinces are as follows:

	Lib.	Con.	Ind.
Ontario	38	48	0
Quebec	52	11	2
Nova Scotia	12	6	0
New Brunswick	11	2	0
Manitoba	2	8	0
Saskatchewan	9	1	0
Alberta	4	3	0
British Columbia	2	3	0
Prince Edward Island	3	1	0
	133	83	2

The Liberal majority in the previous parliament was 62.

Local and Personal

Mrs. H. Oliver is at present visiting friends at Westbank. She will be absent a month.

W. Arthur Battye, pianoforte tuner, will visit Penticton about the 10th November. Orders may be left at Hotel Penticton.

E. W. Mutch has been appointed deputy returning officer for Penticton polling division and L. C. Barnes for Penticton south.

Mr. and Mrs. Orr and family, recently of Chilliwack but now of Peachland, spent Tuesday in Penticton. They are thinking of coming here to reside.

Peachland L. O. L., No. 408, will celebrate the 5th of November by a social in their hall. A cordial invitation is extended to all members and friends of the order to be present and join in making the event a success.

The PRESS is in receipt of a sample copy of the handsome litho of Premier McBride which the Vancouver Province is offering as a premium with a year's subscription to that paper at the usual rate. The picture measures 18x24 inches and is as natural as life.

St. Saviour's church is at present receiving a much needed improvement by way of an addition, the old building having been sawed in two and an addition built between the parts. We are glad to note that the growth of the congregation has rendered the addition essential.

A celebration will be held in Penticton on the King's birthday Nov. 9, under the auspices of the Turf Club. There is expected to be a turkey shoot, a football match in the forenoon and horse races in the afternoon, while a concert is in course of preparation for the evening. The proceeds will be devoted to the improving of the recreation grounds.

A most successful dance was given on Thursday night in Steward's Hall by the ladies of St. Saviour's church. Between 70 and 80 were present and a most enjoyable evening was spent, the dancing continuing until 3 a. m. The music was supplied by Messrs. Lupton and Shaw of Peachland. The committee expect to realize about $60 over expenses.

The regular meeting of the W. C. T. U. will be held in the Methodist church Thursday, Nov. 5th. All ladies are invited to attend. The officers have been appointed for the balance of the year as follows: Pres., Mrs. Rowe; Vice-Pres., Mrs. Baker; Sec'y, Mrs. F. Layton; Cor. Sec'y and Rec. Sec'y (combined), Mrs. D. A. Stewart; Supt. Juvenile Dept., Mrs. Thompson.

We have just received from Great Britain a shipment of over 300 beautiful presentation books. The public will find something here suitable for all ages and sexes. These will be sold at very low prices, from 35c. to $1.00. We would invite you to call and select your proposed gift and have it laid away for you, before the stock is broken. HENRY MAIN, Druggist and Stationer.

Some mischevious or thoughtless persons recently broke a large number of bottles to fragments on H. Murk's wharf, using them for targets in shooting. The result is that the lake bottom is littered with broken glass, utterly ruining the place for bathing purposes. The citizens of Penticton have just reason to pride themselves in their excellent lake beach, and such actions are inexcusable, whether on the part of man or boy.

The Elections.

Now that the general result of the Dominion elections is known people will again settle down to business and forget their differences. Here in Yale-Cariboo and a few other constituencies, however, we must wait a couple more weeks before the tension is entirely over. In those constituencies, the contest now resolves itself into one of personality rather than one of party. The question is, which is the better man, and which would make the better representative for the district? Had the election in Yale-Cariboo taken place at the same time as the general elections, there can be but one opinion as to whom should be the member when the House again meets.

Mr. Ross has offered no satisfactory explanation as to why he insisted upon the election in Yale-Cariboo being deferred, and upon the platform during the campaign, he has avoided the question altogether. Whether Mr. Ross did or did not purpose to take an unfair advantage of his opponent is a question for each voter to decide for himself, but should Mr. Ross win, which is exceedingly doublful, in view of the manner in which British Columbia has pronounced itself in three out of four constituencies, it can scarcely be considered a manly or fairly won victory.

Despite what has been said by both sides during the campaign, the result of the elections has been about as expected with the exception that the government has been returned with a larger majority than was expected by even its most ardent supporters. British Columbia has pronounced itself strongly for the opposition. This will no doubt be regarded by the government, as it is in fact, the pronouncement of the province upon the Oriental immigration, and better terms questions, those being the chief issues put forth by the Conservatives. A strong opposition from this province will be more fruitful of results in the next parliament touching those matters than the "solid seven" were during the last. The Dominion will now see exactly the attituce of this province in regard to the questions.

PEACHLAND.

Mrs. Spofford, Provincial Organizer for the W. C. T. U., addressed a union congregation in the hall Sunday evening. The pastors of the several churches took part, also the combined choirs. Mr. G. K. Mitchell sang in his usual good style "Where is my Boy To-Night." At the close a Local Option League was formed with a very encouraging number of members.

The Girls' Handicraft Club met at Miss Urquhart's home Thursday, with a good attendance.

The Baptist Ladies' Sewing Circle met at Mrs. Ritchie's home Thursday afternoon.

Mrs. Campbell, of Westbank, is the guest of Mrs. Dorland.

School started again Monday morning with a full attendance, after a ten days' enforced holiday owing to the heating facilities not being in order.

Owing to the serious illness of one of the young ladies of Peachland the party, which Mrs. A. Towne was planning to have take place Saturday to the "Pincushion," was postponed.

Ronald Elliott, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Elliott, was taken to the Kelowna hospital Saturday, having a slight attack of typhoid.

H. E. McColl is ill at present. All hope for a speedy recovery.

Miss Long and Miss Lane arrived from Calgary on Monday, and will spend the winter at the home of Mrs. H. Cossar. They visited the lower lake points the latter part of the week.

Mr. and Mrs. Orr and family, of Chilliwack, have arrived to spend the winter with us. We are delighted to learn that Miss F. Orr possesses a very fine voice, which will be a pleasant addition to the musical circle this winter.

The Plow Woman

By ELEANOR GATES,

Author of "The Biography of a Prairie Girl."

Copyright, 1906, by McClure, Phillips & Company.

"Fraser," said Lounsbury, "did you hear that the colonel wanted an interpreter?"

"Why—why—great Scott!"

"Exactly—great Scott!" The storekeeper set off again.

"Hold on!" Fraser caught his arm. "Your scheme's all right, but you can't impress the man. He's got to go of his own accord."

"H'm! That's so."

"What you suppose he'll say if you rush in there and ask him to please go away on this long trip and leave your friends serenely in possession of the land?"

"I wouldn't say 'please'—but you're right. Let's take a look through that window."

Fraser assented. Shoulder to shoulder they tiptoed forward and, keeping out of the shaft of light, viewed the scene within.

It was a busy one and well bore out the inviting legend of the shingle sign. Along the plank bar "the troopers" were thickly ranged, smacking their lips in "delight" over greasy glasses. Beyond them was a squint eyed man who trotted untiringly to and fro, mixing and pouring. Nearer was the stove, its angular barrel and widespread legs giving it the appearance of some horrid fire belching animal.

An unbroken circle of men surrounded it, hats on, rawhide bottomed chairs tilted back to an easy slant. From their pipes and cigars smoke rose steadily and hung, a blue mist, against the sloping rafters of the roof.

There was little talking in the circle. Two or three were asleep, their heads sagging on their necks with maudlin looseness. The others spoke infrequently, but often let down their chairs while they spat in the sand box under the stove or screwed about in the direction of the gaming table. Among these was old Michael. He sat nearest the door, a checker board balanced on his knees, his black stub pipe in its toothy vise. And when he was not feeding the stove's flaming maw with broken boxes, barrel staves and green wood his blowzy countenance was suspended over the pasteboards he was thumbing in a game of solitaire.

The two outside went under the shaft of light and peeped into the rear of the room. There was Matthews, one of five at a square table. A cigar box partly filled with coin and chips was before him. In front of the other players were other chip piles. About the five, hanging over them, almost pressing upon them, were a number of troopers. Two or three were idle onlookers. But the majority were following with excited interest every turn of the cards.

"Wretches being plucked of their good six months' pay," whispered Fraser.

"Looks like they're in for all night," Lounsbury returned.

But the officer was pinching him. "Sh! See there!"

A half drunken trooper was interrupting the game. He had reeled forward to the table and seemed to be addressing himself to Matthews, who, as he answered, glanced up indifferently. The trooper continued, emphasizing his words by raising a clinched fist and striking the board a blow.

The chip piles toppled. He turned to those about, gesticulating. A few surrounded him, evidently bent on leading him toward the door. Others appeared to be continuing the dispute with Matthews. But as the disturber was pushed out they gradually subsided.

"I've got an idea," announced the storekeeper. And he disappeared around a corner.

When he returned he was leading the trooper and talking low to him. All three retired to the shadow of the wall.

Here there was a colloquy. First Lounsbury held forth, next the trooper, protestingly. When the lieutenant broke in two phrases were frequently repeated "to the guardhouse" and "won't if you will."

At last the three went back to the window.

"Remember," cautioned the storekeeper, "we don't want all these shebangs stirred up."

"Needn't worry," said Fraser. "Just listen to that rumpus down the street."

The disjointed music of a wheezy accordion was rending the night. With it sounded the regular stamp of feet.

Now the trooper rounded the corner. A moment and through the window Lounsbury and the officer saw him enter the door.

He slipped down to a seat beside old Michael. There he stayed for awhile. Whenever a brother trooper looked his way he called him up by the crooking of a finger and whispered to him. Before long a knot of men had again surrounded him. But this time their attention was all for the table at the rear of the room.

There the game was going on. Matthews' chip pile showed where the winnings were gravitating. In the dim light there was a strained look on the faces of the players.

Deal after deal passed. Finally one of the five, having no more disks before him, pushed back his chair and got up.

As he stood, dazed and dismayed, the trooper who had been ejected appeared at his side, clapped him upon the back and spoke. At their elbows was the knot that had gathered at the stove.

The next moment the trooper turned to the table and snatched the pack of cards from Matthews' hand. He held up one, pointing at its back, snapped it down, pointed at a second, then scattered the pack in the air.

Lounsbury and Fraser whipped round the corner and in through the door.

An uproar greeted them. "Cheat!" "Clean him out!" "Do him like Soggy did!" Before them was a jostle of blue backs. Across these, on the farther side of the plank bar, they saw Matthews facing the crowd. His left hand held the cigar box against his chest, his right was up and empty.

"Hold on, boys!" It was Lounsbury.

As if he had caught a cue the foremost trooper—he who had been the disturbing element—repeated the cry and directed the eyes of his comrades to the door.

There was a sudden lull. The men in blue wavered. Here and there a revolver was covertly returned to place.

Lounsbury pushed forward to the stove, Fraser beside him. "Hold on, boys!" he said again and pointed at Matthews. "Hold on—I've got a message for that man."

The lull became a dead silence. To the troopers the sight of shoulder straps was discomfiting, for the officer at once became the personification of the guardroom—chilly, poorly bedded and worse provisioned, of all places the one to be dreaded in raw weather. To Matthews the interruption was welcome. His right hand slowly lowered to join its mate.

"I'm going to ask you to call your little differences with that gentleman off," continued Lounsbury.

Matthews fairly blinked. The storekeeper's voice was soft, confidential, ingratiating.

"Mr. Fraser and I have come to say that Mr. Matthews is wanted to serve as interpreter for Colonel Cummings."

"Interpreter?" queried Matthews.

A bullet head made itself visible from behind a barrel. "Don't let him bluff y', Nick," called a voice.

The other looked round. "Shut y' flytrap, Babe," he commanded.

"Thank you," said Lounsbury pleasantly, "interpreter is right. Two white women are held as captives in an Uncapapa camp somewhere west of here. It's been learned that you understand and speak the tongue. So we present Colonel Cummings' compliments. He would like very much to have a talk with you at Brannon."

It was a solution to Matthews. "Yes? Yes?" he said approvingly, then hesitated in suspicion as he measured the storekeeper.

"Oh, I guess I don't want to be no interpreter," he said.

Lounsbury smiled. "Just as you say, just as you say. Boys"—cheerily—"sorry if I cut in at the wrong time. Don't let us stop your fun. Mr. Fraser is not here officially."

A murmur ran around. The disturbing trooper advanced toward Matthews aggressively.

Up went Matthews' hand again. "Jus' a minute," he said.

The trooper quieted.

Matthews turned to Fraser, mustering an expression of importance.

"Lieutenant," he said, "you give me your word this is so—that there ain't no put up job about it?"

"Put up job?" Fraser reddened, keeping a straight face with difficulty. "I give my word," he said solemnly, "that you're wanted as interpreter and that I'll conduct you safely to headquarters."

Matthews put down the cigar box and saluted.

"Word of an officer," he said, "is different. And if I can do anythin'—long 's it 's ladies"—

He reached to a shelf for his hat.

CHAPTER XII.

THAT night, after Squaw Charley had come and gone, Dallas returned from the lean-to, where she had fed and bedded Simon and the team, to find Marylyn before the hearth, her face flushed and wet with tears. Instantly, all concern, the elder girl knelt beside her.

"Marylyn," she begged, smoothing the soft, unbraided hair spread out upon the robe, "Marylyn, what's the matter?"

A long sob.

"Why, dear baby, don't you fret. We're going to be all right. Dad'll soon be back, Mr. Lounsbury's watching, and we won't lose the little home."

"Oh, it ain't that—it ain't that!" weeping harder than before. "I'm so unhappy!"

It was an answer that smote Dallas to the heart. Some trouble, heretofore concealed, was threatening her sister's peace of mind. And she had not discovered it in time, had not prevented it, had not shielded her as she ought.

"Marylyn, honey, tell me what's the matter."

The younger girl crept closer, screening her eyes.

Dallas lifted her into her arms. Her cheek was feverish, her hands were dry and hot.

Sudden terror seized the elder girl—the old terror that had fastened upon her through all the years of her mother's failing.

"Marylyn," she said huskily, "do you feel that—that you're not as well as you was? Are you afraid you'll be sick like—mother?"

There was an answering shake of the head.

Dallas pressed her close, murmuring her thankfulness, whispering broken endearments. "Oh, Dal's so glad! She couldn't stand it if her baby sister was to suffer. Oh, honey heart, honey heart!"

But Marylyn was not comforted.

"Listen," bade Dallas. "In all your life have you ever asked me to do anything that I didn't do, or to give you anything that I didn't give if I could? And now something's fretting you. I can't think what it is. But you got to tell me, and I'll help you out."

"No, no!"

"I don't care what it is, I won't blame you. If it's something wrong—why, it couldn't be—I'll forgive you. You know that, Marylyn."

Again "No, no," but with less resistance.

"Tell me," said Dallas firmly.

Marylyn looked up. "You'll hate me if I do," she faltered.

The elder girl laughed fondly. "As if I could."

"You promise not to tell pa?"

"Course I promise."

"Oh, Dallas!" She buried her face in her hands. "It's—it's that I—I like him! I like him!"

A moment of perplexity. Then, gradually, it dawned upon the elder girl whom the other meant. In very surprise her arms loosened their hold.

"You do hate me," Marylyn said plaintively.

"No, honey, no—why should I hate you?" Her words were earnest. But her voice—something had changed it. And she felt a strange hurt, a vague hurt that seemed to have no cause.

Marylyn raised herself on an elbow. "He liked me—once," she said. "He showed it just as plain. It was right here—that day the cattle went by."

Dallas got up. She had begun to tremble visibly. Her breath was coming short, as if she had been running.

But the younger girl did not notice. "He stayed away so long," she went on. "Then, today when he came—you remember, Dallas—he just said a word or two to me and laughed at me because I was afraid. And—and I saw that I was wrong, and I—I saw—he liked—you."

"Me!" Dallas turned. She felt the blood come driving into her face. She felt that strange hurt ease and go in a rush of joyful feeling. Then she understood the cause of it and why she had trembled—why that day had been the happiest of her life.

Of a sudden she became conscious that Marylyn's eyes were upon her with a look of pathetic reproach. She began to laugh.

"Nonsense, honey!" she said. "Don't be silly! Me! Why, he'd never like a great big gawk like me!"

"But—but"—

"Me, with my red hair—you know it is kinda red—and my face, sunburned as a' Indian—hands all calloused like—like a man's." She turned back to the dusk through the window. "Oh, no, not me!"

"But you looked so funny just now."

"Did I? Did I?" Dallas stammered out her reason: "Well—well, that was because—because I thought you was going to say it was a soldier." She laughed nervously. "But it was Mr. Lounsbury you meant, honey, wasn't it?"

The suspicion that had troubled the mind of the younger girl was allayed. "Why, Dallas, how could you think such a thing about me! Like a soldier? My, no! It was Mr. Lounsbury—but he don't like me."

She got up and went to the foot of her father's bunk. When she reappeared she was carrying the soap box that held her belongings. On the robe once more, she took out and held up to the light of the fire two books and a strip of beaded cloth.

The elder left the window and stood beside her.

"These are what he gave me," went on Marylyn, putting forward the books. "And this"—she showed the bead work—"he asked me to make for him. But today," mournfully, "he didn't even speak of it."

Dallas leaned down and touched her lips to the other's hair. "Baby sister, what did you expect him to do? Hold up a man with one hand and—and reach out for a present with the other?"

Marylyn put away the box. "Anyway he don't like me."

"Like you? Why, he couldn't help it. There isn't a sweeter, prettier girl on the prairie than my little housekeeper."

"He called me the prairie princess," declared Marylyn, but with lingering doubt.

"Now, that shows," said the elder girl. "Don't you worry another second. When he comes again you'll see."

So Dallas soothed and comforted her until she fell asleep, when she lifted her to her father's bed and covered her carefully. Then she drew aside a swinging blanket to let the firelight shine through—and saw that there were still tears on her sister's face.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE medicine lodge of the Indians stood just within the sliding panel of the stockade. Thirty poles, their tops lashed together so as to leave a smoke hole, their bases spread to form a generous circle, supported a covering of tanned buffalo hides seamed with buckskin thongs. Here, barely an hour after Matthews' arrival at Fort Brannon, Squaw Charley entered hastily and thrust some red coals under a stick pile at the center of the lodge. And at once, by the flickering light of his fire, the warriors of the band entered the low entrance and seated themselves in a semicircle.

When Colonel Cummings learned that an interpreter had been found he promptly ordered the completion of preparations for the Jamieson expedition and the calling of a council, unsatisfactory but necessary. The redskins jailed in the stockade must know both the object of the trip and his terms, so that they, realizing their peril, would reveal the whereabouts of the winter camp of the hostiles.

His interview with Matthews threatened a change in his plans. The latter, having listened to the story of the captured women and to the scheme for their rescue, astonished the commanding officer by declining absolutely to take the proposed journey.

"I'd like t' be obligin'," he said, "but I can't go. I didn't know there was goin' t' be any travelin'. There's business that'll keep me here."

"Why, man," cried the colonel, "I've made you a good offer!"

"I ain't a-sayin' y' didn't," was the curt answer.

Colonel Cummings knew to what "business" he referred, but realized that a discussion of it would not aid in bringing the desired consent. He pretended to guess at reasons for the refusal.

"There's scarcely a possibility of trouble during the journey," he said "Indians don't like to fight in the snow, especially when their families are with them and their war ponies are feeding on cottonwood bark. Besides, their head chief will be sharp enough to see that he'll have to treat and not fight if he wants to save the necks of his favorites. Then, as far as the safety and comfort of my men are concerned, everything is being done Better reconsider, Matthews."

"Can't do it."

Colonel Cummings left his library, where he had been talking, and sought Lounsbury's advice. The two held a short whispered conversation in the entry.

"Let me have a few words with him," said the storekeeper. Matthews' balking was not altogether a surprise. Nevertheless it was a keen disappointment. He had hoped to be able to send Squaw Charley across the river soon with good news. "Let me see him. Maybe I can bring him around."

They entered the library.

"Matthews," began Lounsbury, "you might as well go along. If you stay you can't get a hold o' that claim." He looked at the colonel's clock. "It's midnight. Your six months are up. If you did have a chance it's gone Possession 's nine points in law, and Lancaster 's up at Bismarck nailing the tenth."

If the storekeeper's blunt assertions were of any particular interest to the other he failed to show it. He occupied himself with finding a cigar, cutting it carefully and lighting it at the stove. Then he turned about to Colonel Cummings, his glance as it traveled utterly ignoring Lounsbury.

"Not to mention the risks you run with the boys," added the storekeeper easily, amused by the play of indifference.

"Oh, I guess Shanty Town can take keer of itself," observed Matthews, sending up smoke rings.

Lounsbury walked out.

There was but one thing left for Colonel Cummings to do: Ask this man to interpret in the medicine lodge, that at least the Indians might learn their position. Knowing it, they might be prevailed upon to select one of their own number to accompany the expedition and repeat the terms. The commanding officer, rather provoked at Lounsbury, who, he thought, had harmed and not helped his cause, immediately suggested this course to Matthews.

"I can parleyvoo for you there, all right," agreed Matthews patronizingly. "But how you goin'?"

"You and I alone."

Matthews stared. "Carry any guns?" he asked.

"Not when I go into the stockade. The Indians are without weapons. And I like to show them that I trust them."

The other laughed. "You go t' tell some redskins that they 's goin' t' be strung up and y' don't take no gun. Well, not for me, colonel!"

"Then we'll have a guard."

"O. K. I'm with you."

A scout who understood the sign language was dispatched to the stockade. And by the time the braves were settled down before the blaze Colonel Cummings, Matthews and a detail of armed men were before the aperture of the medicine lodge.

The soldiers waited outside the big wigwam, where they made themselves comfortable by moving up and down. Their commanding officer and the interpreter went in. At their appearance the warriors rose gravely, shook hands and motioned the white men to take seats upon a robe placed at Lame Foot's left hand. The air in the place was already beginning to thicken with kinnikinick and fire smoke. The mingled smell of tobacco and skins made it nauseating. Colonel Cummings would gladly have hurried his errand. But Indian etiquette forbade haste. He was forced to contain himself and let the council proceed with customary and exasperating slowness.

The first step was the pipe. A young Sioux applied a burning splinter to a sandstone bowl and handed the long stem to the medicine man. His nostrils filled he gave the pipe to Colonel Cummings, from whom in turn it passed to Matthews, Standing Buffalo, Canada John and thence along the curving line of warriors. When all had smoked the bowl was once more filled and lighted, and once more it was sent from hand to hand. Not until this ceremony had been repeated many times did the council come to speech.

But neither the commanding officer nor his interpreter made the first address. Though the braves guessed that something unusual had brought about an assembly at this hour and though their curiosity on the subject was childishly live, they surpassed their captor in patience. Stolidly they looked on while Lame Foot rose to his feet.

The war priest was not the figure that had led the band south after the battle—not the haughty, stately brave that the sentimentalist loves to picture. He was feathered and streaked as before. A stone mallet hung from his belt. But he wore no string of bears' claws. They had gone the way of the sutler, which was a tasty way, strewn with bright labeled but aged canned goods. And as for his embroidered shirt, it was much soiled and worn, and he had so gained in weight—through plentiful food and lack of exercise—that he pressed out upon it deplorably with a bulging paunch.

Pompously, but using no gestures or inflections, he began a rambling, lengthy account of his past deeds of valor. From these he finally swerved to the recital of his people's wrongs. He climaxed after an interminable amount of talking with a boast that awakened the hearty approbation of his sloven fellows. "We but wait for the winter to go," he said, "for in the spring we shall have freedom. Our brothers, who are sly as foxes and swift as hawks, will sweep down upon the pony soldiers and slay them."

He sat down amid a chorus of "Ho, ho!" The semicircle moved and bent and nodded. It was plain that he had expressed a common belief.

COMMUNICATIONS

(We do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions of correspondents.)

To the Editor of THE PENTICTON PRESS:

Wednesday of last week was the 103rd anniversary of Trafalgar, a victory of world-wide importance then, but seldom mentioned now.

Napoleon having made a formidable alliance with Spain, the French and Spanish naval forces were concentrated to cover the transportation of a French army to the British shores for the conquest of England. The admirals of the combined fleets knew that once at sea they must reckon with Nelson and they deferred the reckoning as long as possible. When the two fleets did leave port, Nelson promptly fell upon them, and destroyed or captured the greater part of their force, the rest escaping by ignominious flight. Nelson fell, but his work was done. The invasion of England had become a dream for she was now the undisputed sovereign of the sea.

Recalling these doings of long ago, we are reminded of certain moral principles involved in those events and of abiding import still. The principle of Order and the principle of Liberty are alike essential to the existence of civilized man upon the earth. Two great actors on the world's stage exhibited these principles in their character and life. Napoleon was the embodiment of despotic power enforcing order. Nelson represented individual liberty, with public order safeguarded and maintained by constitutional government, under a limited monarchy. The former proved transient because destructive. The latter is thus far enduring because eminently fruitful of good.

"History is Philosophy teaching by example." We should, therefore, test the tendencies of the present by the experiences of the past, and, if it be found that law and order are set at naught, while arbitrary restraints are being put upon individual liberty, we cannot but conclude that agencies are at work in this fair land of the same character and tendency as those which brought such dire disaster upon rich and powerful communities over a century ago.

The Revolution of 1759 was a revolt against brutal oppression, but when a frantic mob wrested supreme power from a besotted kingship, the change was for the worse. A community may do without liberty for six months but it cannot do without order for as many hours. The enemies of order are, therefore, at war with liberty.
