Pillars of a Nation's Gateway

Vancouver and Victoria

"Ending Nowhere!"—Forty years ago, the Western terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway was only a clearing in the forest—Victoria hardly more than a village. British Columbia was a mining colony of a few thousand people. Wise heads nodded grave concern over those 2,500 miles of rails ending nowhere.

Yet the men who built the Canadian Pacific, then the world's longest railroad, saw what all see now—not only a road to Vancouver, but a highway through Canada to the Orient.

On this highway, at the Western gateway, two great cities rear their heads. Great they are, and growing greater. They typify the wealth of a wealthy province. But their position on the Pacific links them directly with the nation's commerce, and brings them within the greater circle of world trade. Half a hundred cities and towns have sprung into being since, to turn British Columbia's resources into wealth, but Vancouver and Victoria still remain the largest.

Vancouver, on the mainland, with its almost land-locked harbor, is the terminal of the Canadian Pacific rail lines. Victoria, a four hour sail across the Juan de Fuca Strait at the southern end of Vancouver Island, is the provincial capital. Both of them are ports for Canadian Pacific steamship services to China and Japan, and for other services to Australia and New Zealand, Alaska, and the coast of British Columbia. Each is the focal point for enormous lumbering, fishing, mining, agricultural and commercial enterprises. And each, it may be added, is also a pleasant city to live in or to play in, for both have a mild climate, larger bodies of water, and multitudinous opportunities for all those outdoor activities which recreate the body and the mind. Equally in winter as in summer are their charming garden-embowdered surroundings the resort of the tourist.
