Edmonton

The Capital of the North West

PERCHED HIGH on the banks of the Saskatchewan River, Edmonton looks proudly over the prosperous Province of Alberta, of which it is the capital. For 130 years (centuries, as time goes in the West) Edmonton has commanded the fur trade of the Northland, and in that trade is still pre-eminent.

Known as the commercial centre of an unusually rich farming area, Edmonton is rapidly assuming a role of greater importance. It is the gateway to the Empire of the North-west—the distributing centre for an area which spreads away into the rich territories of the Peace River country, and to the Mackenzie River Basin—and beyond. It has a veritable spider's web of railways to feed the commerce of its great business houses.

Industrially, Edmonton is making rapid strides. Its long list of manufactures must grow, under the encouragement of unlimited coal supplies and unexcelled shipping facilities.

Edmonton is the educational centre of the province, the seat of the University of Alberta.

The city is situated on both sides of the North Saskatchewan River. That part of the south bank originally known as Strathcona is now connected with the north by a magnificent high level steel bridge, 2,250 feet long and 152 feet above water level: this bridge carries street car tracks, a traffic road, and the Canadian Pacific trains—for the Canadian Pacific, recognizing the greatness of the future of Edmonton, contributed very heavily to the cost of this necessary structure.
