The British Columbian.

Wednesday Morning, Oct. 31, 1883.

Mineral Products.

British Columbia first attracted attention on account of its rich mines. The gold of Fraser river and Cariboo tempted thousands of people to these shores, and the value of the precious metal taken from our mines from 1858 to 1882 amounts to $46,685,334. But gold mining to-day furnishes employment to only a comparatively small portion of our population. The agriculturist, the stock raiser, the lumberman, the fisherman, and the coal miner represent interests quite as important as the gold hunter. Nevertheless, gold will for a long time form an important factor in our resources. This province abounds in gold. Almost everywhere indications of its existence may be found. It is scattered all the way from the boundary line to Alaska, and from the Rocky mountains to the waters of the Pacific. Every person who has prospected to any extent in British Columbia believes that there are large deposits of gold in many places which have not yet been discovered. The rough and mountainous character of the country makes prospecting extremely difficult and mining expensive. But when our railway system has been developed, and our public roads have been improved and extended, these obstacles will gradually disappear and we have no doubt mining operations will be carried on over a vast extent of territory. From a return of the mineral products of the United States last year we find that coal heads the list, iron coming second and the precious metals next. The value of coal mined in the U. S. in 1882 is $146,632,181; iron, $106,336,429; silver, $46,800,000; gold, $32,500,000; copper, $16,038,091; lead, $12,624,550. The total value of minerals, including petroleum and stone, is put down at the enormous sum of $445,912,406. We have not a country as large as the United States, but it is probably very much richer in minerals than a similar area anywhere else on the continent. In view of our extensive deposits of gold, silver, iron, lead, coal, and other minerals, the exploration and development of this province are matters which should engage the most serious attention of the government and capitalists. We believe the present government are disposed to encourage this exploration and development. They propose to spend large sums in road-building, and to offer every facility to those who engage in intelligent mining operations. But these resources must be developed by individual enterprise. As soon as the Canadian Pacific Railway has been completed to the ocean we may confidently look for a large influx of persons from the east seeking for schemes where they may invest their capital, and we know of no part of the continent where more opportunities will be found than in British Columbia.

The Wheat Belts.

SCIENTIFIC ANALYSIS OF WHEAT SPECIMENS.

Washington, Oct. 9.—Professor Clifford Richardson, of the Department of Agriculture, has just completed a two-years' task in the analysis of nearly 2,000 specimens of wheat from various parts of the country and comparing them with each other and with European wheat. He says that the main failing of our wheat is a deficiency in albuminoids, which are regarded as the most valuable portions of the grain. Among our wheats the highest percentage of albuminoids was 17.15, while a Russian wheat from Minnesota contained 24.56 per cent., twenty-four different specimens averaging 19.48 per cent., the lowest having 10.68 per cent. In the East our wheat is the poorest, falling below the general average in albuminoids and ash and in the size of the grain. A regular gradation of improvement from east to west is found until the Pacific coast is reached, where there is a most remarkable falling off, in everything but the size of the grain. It is in the country between the Mississippi and the mountains that the best grain is produced. The middle west, represented by Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee, holds an intermediate position between this district and that on the Atlantic coast. The latter shows plainly that its soils have been more or less worn out, the middle west that it is loosing its fertility and the far west the fact that it contains those stores of plant food and nitrogen especially, which make a rich grain.

A Great Age.

A LIVING NOVA SCOTIAN BORN IN 1755.

Pictou News:—There is a man at present living at Waugh's River, three miles from Tatamagouche village, in the county of Colchester, who is probably older than any other man in Nova Scotia. His name is John Smith. He was born in the Shetland Islands, Scotland, in the year 1765, and is therefore just 118 years of age, having outlived by nearly half a century the period allotted to man. His father was a Scotchman, but his mother was of foreign extraction. He enjoyed few educational privileges, having spent his early years as a shepherd boy in the highlands of Scotland. Mr. Smith is of medium height, but is very much stooped and greatly emaciated. Those who remember seeing him about 25 or 40 years ago say he is much smaller every way now than at that time, and greatly reduced both in bone and muscle. His eyesight is tolerably good; he can see distinctly at a great distance and can distinguish objects on a mountain six or seven miles distant with greater ease than most young persons. In fact he can see better at that distance than very much nearer. He is of course very dull in hearing, as might be supposed. His teeth were all gone 40 years ago, but those who are more intimately acquainted with him affirm that his third set are now fast appearing. His other senses are comparatively good. His mental faculties are not much impaired either, except that he is getting rather peevish and self-willed, and somewhat childish in his conversation. When well advanced in life Mr. Smith married a comparatively young lady, who, though now on the verge of a ripe old age, is nearly two score years younger than her husband.

A Car Driver's Romance.

"I used to think it my duty to cut 'em with the whip, and I took satisfaction in striking hard, but I wouldn't strike a boy now for the best thousand dollars ever coined."

He was a car driver, and his attention had been called to three or four boys stealing a ride on the rear platform.

"Yes, I was a sort of terror on this route to the boys," he continued, after a pause. "Not one of the crowd could put his foot on the step and get away without a cut from the whip. Big or little, rough or gentle, I served all alike; and if the passengers scowled at me for slashing a little kid of seven or eight, I solaced myself with the reflection that it was my duty."

A passenger was dropped at the corner, and as the car started up again the driver went on:

"Well, one day when the boys had bothered me more than usual I dodged through the car and found a little bit of a chap, not over seven years old, seated on the lower step. He was all humped over and softly crying about something or other. At another time I might have felt pity, but the boys had got my mad up, and what did I do but give the little chap a cut with the lash and call out in such a voice that off he tumbled into the dust. I saw him rise up and limp away, and there was something in the look he gave me that I shan't forget in a hurry. Whoa! now!"

The car stopped to take on two ladies, and presently the driver resumed:

"Do you know that I felt so conscience-stricken that I kept looking for that boy on every trip, calculating to make up with him and secure his forgiveness for my brutality. I did not see him again until the afternoon of the second day."

"And what did he say?" was asked, as the driver hesitated.

"He was in his coffin!" was the reply. "It was his funeral procession, which stopped my car for two or three minutes. That boy was ill when he tried to steal his way home with me, and death was not twenty-four hours away when I lashed him and chuckled over the way he rolled into the street! I tell you, sir, when I saw his coffin in the hearse, and caught a look from the mother, which seemed to charge me with being his murderer, I got a stab at my heart that pains me yet, and I wouldn't strike another boy if the reward was to be the whole line and its outfit."

BROOKLYN BRIDGE A FAILURE.—The Brooklyn bridge was opened with a blare of trumpets, but it is not proving either a fiscal or a popular benefit. It has been in operation nineteen weeks. Its average earnings have been $526 a day. The total earnings were $69,663, the net receipts being $17,744.92. If the business does not improve the annual net earnings would be about $50,000, whereas the interest charge alone is three-quarters of a million annually. The bridge, then, is to remain a great public burden. It is too high up in the world.—Chicago Paper.

A health journal advises: "Do not lie on the left side." This is a very proper admonition. If you are obliged to lie, be careful and lie on the right side. You will find it pays in the end.—Lowell Citizen.

Profanity pays occasionally. A parrot with the largest assortment of oaths fetches the biggest price.—Progress.

True merit brings its own reward, in the case of Burdock Blood Bitters it is rapidly bringing its reward in its increasing sales, as a prominent druggist recently said, "it now sells on its merits." It is the grand specific for diseases of Blood, Liver and Kidneys; 25,000 bottles have been sold, during the last three months.

C. S. Judson, Wallaceburg, says, Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, for Summer Complaints is a splendid preparation, and I do not know of a single case in which it has not given satisfaction, but on the contrary have had many testimonials to its efficacy.

J. E. Kennedy, dispensing chemist, Cobourg, says that no blood purifier that he has ever handled has had such a large sale as Burdock Blood Bitters, and adds, "in no case have I heard a customer say ought but words of highest praise for its remedial qualities.

The British Columbian.

Wednesday Morning, Oct. 31, 1883.

Public Roads.

Few things are of greater importance to a farming population than good roads traversing the district and connecting with the market town, so that farmers can readily haul to market and dispose of the grain and other produce of their farms. The late governments achieved a great deal for the province in this direction during their periods of office, both on the island and mainland. It is doubtful whether better roads can be found in any of the older provinces than those which afford access to the rural districts here, more particularly around this city.—Victoria Standard.

With the first sentence of the above extract we cordially agree; with the last we have no fault to find; but from the second we decidedly dissent. The COLUMBIAN has frequently pointed out the importance of good roads, and it has frequently complained of the wretched condition of the roads throughout the mainland. Vancouver Island may have very excellent roads. Of that we cannot speak intelligently: no doubt the Standard can. But when the Standard undertakes to persuade its readers that the late government "achieved a great deal for the province in this direction, both on the island and mainland," it undertakes a task which will be extremely difficult. It was the badness of the roads on the mainland of British Columbia, and the gross carelessness shown for the convenience of the people, that helped to defeat the government at the last general election. For years the people had been asking for roads and bridges which would enable them to reach the markets. But the government refused to make adequate appropriations for that purpose. They had on hand the dry-dock, where $340,000 of the provincial revenues were swallowed up, and there was scarcely anything left for roads. The government refused to give up the dry-dock as a provincial work, and permitted the roads and bridges to fall into decay and destruction. The people bore the neglect until patience ceased to be a virtue, and at the last election they declared that both the government and the dry-dock must go; and they did go. It is to a great extent the road policy of the present government which has made them so much more popular in the rural districts than their predecessors were. During the first session of parliament they made large appropriations for road work, and declared that the provincial revenues unjustly spent on the dry-dock would be taken to make roads and bridges and other permanent improvements on the mainland, where they were so urgently needed. During the past few months we have come in contact with a large number of farmers and others from various settlements, and the feeling is almost unanimously one of gratitude for what the government have already done in roadmaking. But only one-half the appropriations for roads and bridges has been expended this year. Next spring the other half will be spent, supplemented by another appropriation which we have reason to believe will be very liberal. We do not think there is a journal or a prominent man on the mainland that will undertake to compliment the late government on their road policy. At the public meeting held in this city lately for the evident purpose of securing an expression of public opinion adverse to the present government, the principal grievance which occupied the opposition orators was the shocking condition of our roads. But this grievance lay against the late government, and could not be brought against those now in office. So plainly did this appear that these people wisely refrained from asking an expression of the meeting, and no vote was taken. The Victoria Standard is not always scrupulously correct in its statements, but ordinary prudence would have suggested that the interests of the party it supports would best be served by maintaining a discrete silence on the subject of public roads.

Island Railway Lands.

The people of Nanaimo continue to entertain themselves with public meetings, and to pass resolutions denouncing somebody. The last meeting passed two resolutions, one condemning the settlement bill and the other instructing their representatives to vote against it. The first resolution declares that the construction of the island railway is not in the interest of Vancouver Island, because the coal lands will fall into the hands of a monopoly. It seems to us the people who passed this resoluion did so without sufficiently considering all the circumstances. Victoria city and district, and the district of Esquimalt, may fairly be said to contain a very large majority of the people of Vancover Island. These constituencies have all along been telling the world that the island railway must be built. No other measure would satisfy them. They may have been urging the construction of this work in ignorance of the consequences which would result; but that is their own affair. This one fact has been made prominent, that a majority of the people on Vancouver Island were exceedingly anxious that the railway should be built. For the purpose of securing the construction of that road the provincial government, in 1873, reserved the island railway belt. This tract of land was conveyed to the Dominion government for railway purposes, just as the mainland belt was conveyed for a similar purpose. But the Dominion government determined that they would not construct the island railway as a government work. They had the lands, and they agreed to hand these lands over to a private company, together with a cash bonus of $750,000 to secure the construction of the road. That company happens to be represented by Mr. Dunsmuir, whose miners happen just now to be on strike at Nanaimo. We are afraid these two facts may have had some influence in shaping the resolutions recently passed at the Nanaimo meeting. However that may be, it seems beyond controversy that the island railway lands were not the property of the province, but belonged to the Dominion. The Dominion exercised its right of possession and gave them away for the railway. The people of Nanaimo cannot fairly find fault with the disposal of these lands. So far as we are aware they entered no protest against their being conveyed to the Dominion in the first place; and through all the years intervening since 1873 no voice has been raised against the arrangement. The whole belt was offered last year to the Clements Co. in consideration of their building the railway, and we have yet to learn that the people of Nanaimo offered any protest against that arrangement. Surely the Dunsmuir Co. are quite as much interested in the progress of the co[illegible] the Clements Co. were. The bill was passed by the house under the impression that it would give general satisfaction. Such an impression was perfectly natural under the circumstances, and we are afraid it is now too late for Nanaimo to protest. The settlement bill includes not only the island railway, but the dry-dock and the opening up of the railway belt on the mainland. The government and the house have pledged themselves to that bill, and it is very difficult to see how the pledge can now be withdrawn. So far as we have had an opportunity of ascertaining, we believe the mainland is almost unanimous in favor of the settlement bill. The island railway clauses cannot be expunged without destroying the whole bill, and to that the people would never consent. It may be that the people of Nanaimo are willing to let the island railway go, if the lands can revert to the province and be opened to settlement. As a matter of fact we believe such an arrangement would be much better for the country. But a majority of the islanders would not agree to such an arrangement, and the majority must rule. We object most emphatically to any tampering with the settlement bill, unless the people of Vancouver Island are prepared to release the Dominion government from all obligations with respect to the island railway, abandon the $750,000 bonus, and rest satisfied with retaining possession of the lands. Then the dry-dock and mainland belt would alone constitue the settlement bill. This is the only alteration in the agreement that the mainland will permit.

NELLIE'S MEMORIES.

"You want my news? Well, I have left him better, in a calmer, healthier state of mind, though he is terribly cut up, poor fellow. I took him home and talked and argued with him, and as soon as he came to himself he wrote a letter to her, and made me promise to deliver it."

"A letter, Herwald?"

"Yes, and he wished me to read it; such a brief, beautiful prayer for forgiveness. I stopped at the cottage as I passed and left it."

"At Rose Cottage? whom did you see?" I asked eagerly.

"Only Arthur; he was standing in the porch, and I beckoned him down to the gate. I have been talking for nearly an hour."

"How does he take it Herwald?"

"As I knew he would; all the blood of the Vaughan's is up, and a little of his mother's pride besides. He is hot, indignant, won't hear of any excuse, and blames me in the bargain."

"You, my poor Quixote," said Dudley.

"Yes, it has given me such a confounded headache; and he is such an obstinate beggar, dives down into the root of the matter, and swears by yea and nay. Of course we made it up, old Arthur never bears a grudge; besides, the intimacy is not owing to me; the mischief was done when I was abroad."

"And what about Milly? you have not told me that."

"He says she behaves beautifully, and is quite calm and resigned. Oh, poor fellow, if you had seen his eyes brimful of tears when he told me how he had come home and found her lying on her little white bed——" and here Herwald broke off and sighed heavily.

"I may go to-morrow and see her?"

"Oh yes, you must if you want to see her again; Arthur is going to take her away to North Wales, for a change for a week or two."

"That is very nice, then the money will come in capitally."

"What money?" he said, and looked at me rather odly, I thought, but I did not explain, for the tea equipage was just brought in, and the clock at that moment striking twelve, Herwald insisted on my retiring.

"All this worry," he said, holding my hands, and looking anxiously at me; "all this worry is undoing the week's good, as if you have not trouble enough at home without my friends' affairs bothering you out here."

I tried laughingly to get my hand away, but he held me fast.

"You have done two deeds of mercy for me to-day, and I have not thanked you for them; Heaven bless you, Nell!"

When I got into my little room, I shaded my lamp and threw open the window. The park was lying in a flood of moonlight; the trees met dark and still against the dark blue of the sky; peace, tranquillity, and sacred stillness reigned around; and as I stood I whispered, half aloud:

"Be the day weary, be the day long,
Presently ringeth to evensong."

The following day, at the same hour, we rode over to Rose Cottage, and, as before, Herwald and Dudley went on to Holly-bush Farm, promising to call for me in an hour's time. I entered the silent house; no tripping step, no mirthful laugh greeted me; the little parlor was vacant, and so was the doll's house kitchen; and so I passed out on to the tiny lawn. Milly was sitting on the grass under the mulberry-tree, picking lavender, she sprang up when she saw me, and ran towards me with a low cry.

"How kind of you to come and wish me good-bye; how very, very kind, Nellie!"

She looked as if she had not slept much, and the brightness of her eyes was dimmed with weeping; but it was not this alteration in her appearance that struck me so painfullly, as she stood holding my hands and speaking in that sad subdued voice; and when she drew me to that low green bench, where we had sat that evening, and placed herself at my feet, and played mechanically with my whip and gloves, I looked down on her and marveled at the change. All that was child-like had faded away—all that was womanly, and gentle—and long-suffering had taken its place.

"And so you are going away, Milly?"

"Yes, to-morrow; Arthur thinks it better, and I am willing to do as he wishes; we are going for a month."

"And what then, Milly?"

She drooped her head a moment, as she answered—

"And then home, and quiet days, and long evenings, when Arthur's work is done. I dare say it will be lonely at first, but I shall soon get used to it;" and the brave little face lifted itself up in the sunlight.

"Dear Milly, will you come to me, to Sunnyside? If you will, we will love you dearly, and take care of you, and in our happy home you will soon regain your old spirits."

She smiled faintly as she shook her head.

"Dear, kind Nellie; but it cannot be yet."

"Why not?" I urged; "will not Arthur spare you?"

"Oh, yes, too gladly, I am sure; but I cannot bear that after his long, hard day's work he should come home and find empty rooms, no one to speak to him, and make him comfortable; and even if that could be arranged, I feel that I could not be happy at Sunnyside, not just yet, but in a little while I may."

"Well, then, come to me at Christmas. Herwald will be with us, and Katie, and Lucy Graham; come then, and help us to forget our vacant places."

She clasped me gratefully.

"I should like to, but we have promised to go to Liverpool, to Arthur's god mother, and as she is very rich, she may do something for him, and so we dare not despise such an opportunity, but may I write to you when I can come? perhaps I might in the Easter holidays, you know, when Arthur goes again to Oxford."

"Any time, dear, it matters little to me, only the sooner the better; but now I have only half an hour to spare, and I have much to talk about."

I told her what had passed between me and Mr. Clive; and when I had finished, she drew the letter half out of her bosom, and showed it me.

"I shall keep it till I die, and then it shall be buried with me;" and she carefully replaced it.

"Nellie, do you know he is going away?"

"No, indeed, but I am glad of it; where?"

"To Italy, I think, and Fergusson is to take the duty for six months; Arthur is going to give up our seats at church. Ah, you cannot think how angry he was yesterday.

"Herwald told me."

"He will not be angry any more, it makes me too unhappy; how can any one be hurt with Hubert?" and she folded her hands lovingly over the place where the letter lay, and smiled a little smile to herself.

"Will you write to me, Milly?"

"To be sure I will, and you will send me long answers, all about yourself and Sunnyside."

"I will try what I can do, but I am not a good correspondent, I leave most of that to Louie, she is the clever woman of the family."

Just then a long shadow fell on the grass; it was Arthur's, and at the same moment I heard the hoofs of the returning horses. Arthur's blue eyes sparkled through his spectacles, as he warmly grasped my hand.

"Miss Mortimer, I owe you a debt of gratitude for the kindness you have shown my little girl," and he clasped her fondly as he spoke. "She tells me she has already learnt to look upon you as her best friend."

Milly smiled up at me.

"Nellie knows what I think of her; oh, there they come, and you must go," and she clung to me with long lingering kisses. My eyes were dewy enough as I followed Arthur, and when I had wished him good-bye, she came out and stood in the porch, and waved to me with fluttering hands till I was out of sight.

* * * * * *

It was the last day of our stay at Hurst Hall. I had formed a resolution the preceding night to rise early and revisit all my favorite haunts, and as soon as the sun shone brightly and warmly in at my window, and the birds began their waking twittering, I rose, and after a hasty toilette, crept noiselessly down the eastern corridor, so as not to disturb the sleepers. But I was not to escape unperceived, the sound of my unhallowed footsteps aroused the wary hounds; first Leo came and peeped at me suspiciously through the curtain, and then Max, and after satisfying themselves that I was no unmannerly intruder, followed me with many demonstrations of joy. Early as I was they were flooding the tesselated pavement of the great hall below; and one sleepy-eyed domestic, stifling a yawn, opened the garden door, through which I and my self-imposed guardians passed into the pure morning air beyond. The dew lay heavy on grass and bush, and a delicious freshness and coolness pervaded the air, sweet with the fragrance of opening flowers. As I entered the park, the sense of absolute stillness was marvellous, nothing crossed our path but a startled hare, or a fawn answering to its mother's call, and nothing stirred the slumbrous silence save the lark's voice caroling in the morning blue, or the bleat of some distant sheep. One after another I bade farewell to each pleasantly associated spot; the wild garden, the trout stream, the fernery where we had worked, the arbor in the bowling-green where I had sat and mused—bade them farewell with the fondness one attaches to spots where many happy hours have been passed, regarding them with

"The feeling of sadness and longing,
Which is not akin to pain,
And resembles sorrow only
As the mist resembles rain."

It was certainly rather hard to brace myself up to the home-work after the delicious "far niente" and ease of the last two months; to go back to the old niche, and become one of the plodders again in the work-a-day world; but if hard for me, doubly so to Dudley, to whom was the burden and heat of the day. Returning to the house, some two hours later, I came upon Herwald in the chintz parlor, playing with Sprite on the hearth-rug. He listened with a faint smile as I recounted, well-pleased, my morning ramble.

"So you are sorry to leave Hurst Hall, Nellie; well, I can only say you are not half so much as I am to lose you. I wish our lazy lie-a-bed had joined your stroll, if he could have gathered such roses as those."

"Dudley not down yet!"

Herwald gave me one of his comical looks.

"We prolonged our last library talk to too late an hour, and the boy has the grace to be sleepy this morning; oh, there he is," as Dudley entered with eyes only half awake.

"Yet a little more sleep and a little more slumber," cried Herwald, putting Sprite in his pocket, in which position she usually took her breakfast. "Halloa! what is all this rubbish, Nellie?"

Rubbish, indeed! I put them carefully aside, the relics of my morning rambles; only a leaf from the fernery, a smooth white pebble from the stream, a forget-me-not from the bank where Milly and I had sat, a pheasant's feather picked up on a mossy knoll; but they were precious to me, and to be treasured as such.

A softened gravity stole over our young host's face, as he watched me put them up.

"I can hardly believe you are going to leave me to-day, really going away."

"Oh, that is not the worst," replied Dudley; "the thing is, I am going home a spoiled man. Nellie, this fortnight has ruined me for the factory."

"You are jesting, surely?"

"On my honor, no; I always disliked the treadmill, and now I shall hate it ten times more."

"Are you really in earnest, Dudley?"

"Why, what big eyes, little Wolf! don't eat me up. Look here, Quixote, this girl has grown up with the notion that I love the factory, love the grinding, oily, musty old place; just because I have never grumbled or complained, or talked grandly, like 'the Bruce.'"

"And you disliked it all this time?"

"Dislike is a strong word, ma petite; one must not speak ill of the bridge that carries you over the water; but I own I have never liked it; and if the truth be told, never shall. Why, as to Bruce, for all his lordly palaver, it's shallow humbug, every bit of it; the fellow adores the place, likes, nay really enjoys its bustle, and din, ay, and the downright hard work too, and there is not a better man of business breathing, though I say it,—but for me——"

"Well, Dudley?"

"Well, I would fain be working on my own broad acres, sowing and reaping harvests, and eating the fruit thereof; be a farmer, country gentleman, what you will, so that it bring plenty of healthy out-of-door exercise; mind, I don't aspire to Hurst Hall, something humbler would content me, even Abbey Farm: anything to work on the green earth and under the open sky."

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

Remember that procrastination is the thief of time so

It matters not what your troubles may be, come and let the Doctor examine your case. It will cost you nothing for consultation, so please call and satisfy yourselves whether the Doctor understands your case. Parties at a distance wishing treatment, by sending $25 and a minute description of their troubles will receive in return a full course of treatment securely packed so as not to excite curiosity.

DR. SPINNEY will guarantee to forfeit Five Hundred Dollars for every case of any kind or character which he undertakes and fails to cure.
