The Public Pulse

[Under this head we will publish any communication sent to us on questions of interest to the public. Our only conditions are these: First, the writer's name must accompany the pen name: vituperation is not argument and will not be accepted: make your point quickly and then quit.—ED.]

THROUGH BLUE GLASSES

Editor THE EDENOGRAPH:

In your paper of the issue of the 1st inst. you attempt to quote figures showing the advantages of city incorporation for the town of Enderby, and as I consider them erroneous and misleading, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to point out wherein they are wrong.

In the first place you state that "Enderby will this year contribute about $2,500 to the provincial treasury." Evidently you are not very well informed at to the amount of assessment on real estate in Enderby. Last year the assessment on real estate within the limits of the proposed incorporation amounted to $66,735, which at the rate of 1 per cent would mean to the town of Enderby a revenue of $667. Of course these figures are taken from the assessment roll of last year and no doubt the assessment has substantially increased, but granting that it has increased 100 per cent (and I do not think the most rabid advocate of incorporation can claim more), this would give the town of Enderby a revenue, from assessable real property, of $1,334, with 10 per cent off would leave $1,201, from source, then adding $425, the amount of revenue derived from licenses, etc., would bring the amount of revenue up to about $1,700.

Now as to the running expenses of the proposed incorporation. We will take your own figures, and I do not think you yourself can attempt to deny putting them at the lowest possible limit, so as to paint in roseat hues the advantages of city incorporation. You state that "the clerk and incidentals, stationery, printing, office rent, etc., would cost $1,300 a year." This amount deducted from the gross revenue of $1,700 would leave nearly $400 at the disposal of a council.

This amount in itself is a ridiculously small sum upon which to think of maintaining o city incorporation, but you have failed to point out that the maintenance of the public school to a very great extent falls upon a city incorporation, and which in the first three months would sweep away the remaining $400. You also failed to point out to the public the fact that there are bound to be heavy bills for the first two years for printing and legal expenses, which in other towns are not very "nominal."

You suggest that the clerk can act as constable. Well this is surely a new departure in municipal government. Surely the people of Enderby are not looking for a cheap John government of that kind. Why should we try to assume a position which we cannot maintain with dignity?

Then again, you omitted to point out that the incorporation is supposed to maintain law and order within its limits and must stand all the expense of maintaining and transporting prisoners to the provincial jail, while the fines and all revenues from this source go to the Provincial Government. These are only a few of the items which can be enumerated to show that the revenue of the proposed town incorporation is not sufficient to maintain it without an enormous increase in taxation, and you with surprising frankness admit "nobody knows what the taxation will be under incorporation."

I do not wish to poise as one who is opposed to advancement and progress, for I am a firm believer in municipal government, but it is very evident to the most casual observer of unprejudiced mind that Enderby is not at present far enough advanced to take upon herself the responsibilities of incorporation, and a large number of her citizens are of the opinion that a rural municipality, which would take in the town and surrounding country, would be better suited to this section at the present time. The revenue from the assessment of real property of a rural municipality will amount this year to $4,000 to which can be added $425 from licenses, etc., thus making a total revenue of $4,425. The running expenses would not be any greater than that of a city municipality, and under such the town would advance and the country would develop, then when the time arrives that Enderby is strong enough to incorporate as a town or city let her do so by all means, but the people who have the real interests of the town at heart should be certain of the wisdom of their action before using their influence toward loading the town with a burden, which if assumed thus prematurely must of certainty prove disastrous to her future prosperity.

WALTER E. TRUESDALE.

["Advice is not worth any more than we pay for it." We did not pay anything for the above. There is just one thing the matter with our protesting friend: he is about six months late with his figures and his advice. We infer from his remarks that Mr. Truesdale is a "casual observer of unprejudiced mind." He is not a property owner in the town, so he must be that. No doubt had he pleaded his cause so eloquently six months ago, and been as free with his advice, such men as H. W. Harvey, Geo. Bell, H. W. Wright, Geo. McCormick, manager of the Kamloops Lumber Co., F. V. Moffet, manager of the Columbia Flouring Mills, R. P. Bradley, J. C. Metcalfe, F. H. Hale, G. R. Sharpe, P. Greyell, Ira C. Jones, Geo. R. Lawes, J. W. Evans, all large property owners—the men who pay the taxes,—we say, if Mr. Truesdale had put their hearts right then—six months ago—perhaps they,——but he didn't. And, because they and fellow property owners decided upon town incorporation, Mr. Truesdale has predicted direful things for these and other gentlemen. One would think that the business men and property owners were combining to rob themselves and bring ruin upon their homes, and that Mr. Truesdale was the only honest man in the bunch who had "the real interest of the town at heart."

Mr. Truesdale is evidently an adept in phantom figures. "Figures do not lie, but those who use them sometimes do," said a philosopher. Not so in this case. Simply an apparition. If Mr. Truesdale had taken the pains to look over the list compiled from the official records for the purpose of forwarding to Victoria with the petition for incorporation, he would not now have to guess at the assessable value of the property within the town limits. The amount in round numbers is $280,000. This will give a revenue, after all deductions, of $2,500. To this add the amount collected from licenses and we have $3,000—the amount heretofore named by us. To demonstrate that our figures as to the probable cost of local administration—($1,300)—is about right, we reproduce from the Slocan Drill the official figures showing what it cost last year in Slocan City:

Stationery, etc	$ 21.30
Rent	75.00
Salaries, police	240.05
" clerk	163.50
" solicitor	100.00
" treasurer and collector	190.55
" auditor	50.00
" assessor	75.00
Election expenses	74.30
Advertising	7.55
	$1105.25

With all the offices filled, it cost Slocan City $200 less than the amount set by us for Enderby. And Slocan City is half again as large as Enderby.

The matter of school is not so serious as the Pull-backs make out. The government gives $10 for every child enrolled. Enderby would draw something like $1,100. The cost of the school would probably be $600 in excess of the government allowance.

Figuring then, $600 for school and $1,300 for administration, we still have a balance of $1,100 for other municipal purposes.

Mr. Truesdale lays great stress upon the fact that the town would have to pay the expense of sending criminals to jail. Dear, dear; that's awful! Our only salvation, Walter, is to run fast! ---ED.]

ARROWHEAD FIRE

Arrowhead, Feb. 7.—[Special to THE EDENOGRAPH.]—Last night about midnight the boarding house of the Arrowhead Lumber Co.'s mill burned to the ground. Robt. McTaggart, from Nova Scotia, lost his life, and W. R. Beatty, manager of the company, was seriously injured. The lumber piles caught fire, but were saved after a hard fight. The mills were not damaged.

It was a calm night. Had a wind been blowing the fire would have made a clean sweep. It is supposed the fire was caused by the watchman's dog upsetting a lamp while the watchman was making his rounds. Loss partly covered by insurance.

Manager Beatty was removed to the Revelstoke hospital by special train.

School Board Meeting

At the school board meeting last Saturday the attendance was exceedingly light, as usual. Those patrons who have been most generous with their complaints, were most conspicuous by their absence. Dr. Bently received the only nomination to fill the unexpired term of Mr. McQuarrie, as school trustee, and was declared elected without a poll.

After the election was over, the electors present held an informal meeting with regard to the sanitary condition of the school. The trustees explained that the allowance of $80 a year for all purposes of heating, lighting etc., did not leave sufficient to keep the school as clean as it should be. An effort is to be made to have the grant increased.

Safe breakers have been operating in Enderby. Some bad boy or boys entered the Presbyterian church one day last week and robbed the children's safe of the Mission Band funds. A reward of $5 has been offered for information leading to the culprit's capture.

A. M. Baird returned this morning from the East, accompanied by his bride.

The "Roarin' Game"

There have been some hot times on the ice the past week, and at breakfast, dinner, supper; in and out of business; on the street, in store, office and barroom, the "roarin' game" has been the one theme of conversation. The finals in the President and Vice-President competition have been played and D. Nairn's rink holds the button by default of W. Hancock's rink. The results of these games is as follows:

Young Todd	Young 12–7	Nairn 11–10	Nairn by default
Heggie Nairn	Nairn 9–7
Bell Matthews	Matthews 13–7	Hancock 17–4
Hancock Brown	Hancock 11–7

The ice has been somewhat heavy, but this has not interfered with the games to any extent. La Grippe is also taking a hand.

Telephone Wanted

An effort is being made to induce the government to extend the telephone system inaugurated in the southern end of the Valley, northward from Vernon to Armstrong, Enderby and on to Mara. Thus the whole Valley would be brought in speaking distance, and by a government line at that. This would be of immense value, not only to the towns, but also to the farmers from one end of the Valley to the other. A petition is being circulated asking for the extension of the line to Enderby, but it should not stop here. The Mara district is in actual need of the line. The C. P. R. has refused to give them an agent, and they are cut out of the service of the telegraph. They are dependent upon a tri-weekly mail for all communication with the outside world. Why should such a rich district as Mara be deprived of the convenience of a government-owned line? The farmers and lumbermen there need it far more than we do, for Enderby can use the telegraph, but Mara is cut out entirely.

The advantages of having a government-owned and operated line over a private-owned line are many, and it should be to the interest of all to push the matter to realization.

Enderby Doings

Born.—At Enderby, Feb. 7th, 1905, to Mr. and Mrs. Bowling, a son.

Yonng's tonsorial parlors are the scene of some very warm bonspeils.

The office addition to the Harvey block is about ready for the finishing touches.

Another large consignment of flour was sent to Hong Kong, last week from the Enderby mills.

On Friday evening, the Ladies' Aid will give another house social, this time at the home of Mrs. J. W. Evans.

J. A. Morrison, wife and children, were passengers on Monday's train. Mr. Morrison will be station agent at Enderby.

If you like to wear a good looking shoe, you should see the large stock of McCready's just unpacked by the Enderby Trading Co.

Rev. Jonas Bushnell, temperance orator and lecturer, is announced to address a meeting in the Methodist church on Thursday evening at 8 p. m.

A strayed hog has found shelter and food in the pen at the Columbia Flouring Mills for the past fortnight or more. Owner will please claim property, pay charges and take away.

Will Hill returned from a very successful trip into the Boundary and Slocan this week. He is the B. C. representative of the Alexander Milling Co., of Brandon, Man.

A new engine has been bringing the Molasses Limited in on time, or nearly on time, since Monday. And each incoming train has consisted of sixteen cars. This is the line that doesn't pay the C. P. R.

Thirteen loaded freight cars, a packed baggage coach, and two crowded passenger coaches, constituted Monday morning's train over the Molasses Limited. And, yet, we are told the line doesn't pay! What a bluebottle!

The Okanagan Herald has suspended publication at Vernon, and Manager Haggen, promises to buy up all the shares sold by him in the Valley on the strength of his promise to establish the Herald. It is reported that John B. Kennedy will revive the publication.

The B. C. Gazette contains the official notice of incorporation of the Enderby Coal Mines, Ltd., with a capital of $250,000, shares $1. Thus the company is rapidly getting in shape to proceed with the extensive development of its valuable coal property near Enderby.

P. Burnett, P. & D. L. S., will open a survey office in Enderby in a few weeks. Mr. Burnett is one of the best-known land surveyors in the interior, and his selection of Enderby as his headquarters will be mutually beneficial. He hopes to be located by the 1st of March.

Rev. J. H. Wright, of Vernon, passed out to the mainline last Thursday en route to Vankleek Hill, Ont. He was accompanying the body of his brother-in-law, N. A. Cheney, who died at Vernon from pleuro-pneumonia. Mr. Cheney had been teaching school in the Mable Lake district.

Walter Robinson, a practical fruit tree grower and nurseryman, has located at Enderby, and is already mapping out his spring work. He will do the pruning for the fruit growers at Salmon Arm, and is also preparing to take up the work in the Enderby district, where pruning is much deeded.

Dr. Telford and Dr. Vereertbrughen, who were recently debarred as practicing physicians by the Medical Society of B. C., were last week replaced on the roll by Mr. Justice Morrison. While there isn't anybody who would like to see Dr. Vereertburghen out of a job, still most everybody would like to see him adopt a simpler way of spelling it.

This piece of news cost us a subscriber last week—the first we have lost. "It is a poor grade of loyalty to local institutions and enterprise to send out of town for anything that is manufactured in the town and can be bought as cheap as the article from the East. Stand up for Enderby and Enderby institutions!"

Anniversary services will be held in the Methodist church of Salmon Arm on Feb. 19th. Rev. Mr. Sutherland will preach. On Monday evening an oyster supper will be served from 6 to 8, after which a grand concert will be given in the church by Mrs. S. S. Osterhout and Dr. Gerry of Kamloops, assisted by local talent.

On the evening of St. Valentine's Day, the Ladies' Home Mission Society of Armstrong will hold in the Foresters' hall, a Birthday Party. Invitations have been sent out, accompanied by small money bags, in which the recipient is supposed to deposit an amount equivalent to his years, a cent for each year. Everybody will be young again, "just for tonight."

Mr. Fortune is enjoying a visit from his cousin, Mr. McPherson, of Manitoba, who is making a tour of British Columbia. Mr. McPherson has just come from a month's stay at Halcyon Hot Springs, and is generous in his compliments of the genial manager, J. N. McNaught, who for some years has catered to the comforts of the hundreds who have thronged that popular health resort.

Mack Bros.' Lumber Yard

Huntley's saw mill started with a full force of men on Mack Bros.' timber limit, four miles down the river, on Saturday, and is now doing excellent work. Fourteen men are employed in the mill, and as many in the timber. They have 600,000 feet of logs to start on. The season's cut will run something over a million feet.

The mill is equipped with up-to-date machinery, and is prepared to turn out all grades of rough and dressed lumber. Mack Bros. are handling the product.

Would Lower Mabel Lake

The Kootenay Mail says: A matter that should have the attention of the government is the lowering of Mabel Lake, a work that would result in a largely increased area of first-class land being made available in the Mable Lake district. We are informed the lower channel of the Skookumchuck, which, at the outlet of Mabel Lake, could be easily lowered at small cost. The work is at least one of feasability into which the government should instruct their engineers to enquire.

WON'T LOOK UP

Every citizen in Enderby, except, perhaps, the pull-backs, was delighted to learn last week that the incorporation movement is not dead, and as the matter is becoming better understood the hopes of all grow brighter. Men who can look ahead a few months, see the great need of incorporation, and the utter impossibility of our coping with the conditions that will prevail here, should incorporation be defeated. They realize that if Enderby is to stop the tide of land and opportunity hunters now flowing past us, we must get out of the rut that has so long kept us confined, and reach out boldly for what belongs to us by right of merit.

It is true, the pull-back five have not given up the fight. They followed up their action at the citizen's meeting, with a letter to the political head. But it is not probable any attention will be paid to their objections, which are so ill-founded. The whole town is unanimous on the question, and where such a feeling exists, the worst that can be done by the fearful is to delay the matter.

The trouble with those who oppose incorporation is not the lack of good will so much as it is the lack of good judgment. They look behind instead of ahead. What Enderby has been is nothing; what it is going to be is much. We must build for the future, not on the record of the past, but the possibilities of the present and the future. We must look up and around us. Because two or three have depreciated the value of their property to the assessor so as to make their taxation lower than it should be, it does not follow that the town should be held back to enable them to plug along in the same old way. No man need be afraid of incorporation who is ready to stand his share of the expense of public improvements. It is the man who has a pull and is afraid he will lose it, the man who wants something for nothing, that is usually oppose to advancement.

A SOUND COIN MONEY

It is difficult to induce our Canadian people to study, or even discuss, the question of money. They have become accustomed to the existing order of things and fail to perceive wherein things can be bettered. But surely things can be bettered. No doubt it will take some years of agitation, but when the matter is fully understood there will be a change.

Until the people awake to their needs, and demand what they want—a silver and gold circulating medium, coined at a ratio compatible with that of other world powers, and in quantities to suit the country's demands—until this is done, they will be forced to pay interest on credit and use non-legal tender bank notes, which are only a substitute for money. Suppose they should demand the safe ratio in use by the Netherlands—say $2.50 of silver to one of gold, to the limit of $15 per capita. This would mean the coining of $90,000,000 of new silver.

No doubt the banks would object. They would not favor anything that would mean the retirement of the bank notes. But the immediate and permanent effects of the addition to the country's wealth would be incalculable. The first mint in Canada will be opened possibly before this year closes. It is doubtful if our statesmen have give the matter of Canadian coinage a moment's thought. Sure it is that the people have not. Suppose the Netherland ratio were to be adopted and the per capita raised from $7.50 to $15. This would mean an order for $60,000,000 worth of Canadia silver bullion. Such an order would immediately force the price of silver up to nearly its coinage value. What an impetus would at once be given the mining industry of British Columbia! What a demand for all sorts of mining, milling and smelting machinery, electric plants, railway extensions, for lumber, coal and all that the mining communities, with their large cash purchasing power, could consume! What a cash market for the farmers and all rural producers in Western Canada!

At once the population of our rich Dominion would increase by thousands. Before the first order for silver could be filled by our mines the population would have increased to twenty or thirty millions. With all their efforts the mines could scarcely keep the per capita up with the increase in population. And such an order from the Dominion government would send such a stampede into Canada of the most enterprising people from all civilized countries as all the efforts of the immigration department and agencies advertising the country could not start in motion. The splendid prosperity of Canada, without a parallel on earth, would do the trick.

Miss Carrie E. Hayes, of Forest City, N. B., weighs 550 pounds and enjoys perfect health.

Klipling was 40 years of age on Jan. 6th. last.

With The Owl

HANK REKLAW IN THE DARK WOODS.

HERE is a thought: If you don't like to be chewed to pieces by a buzz-saw, don't get into the buzz-saw's way. It is not an original thought, but it is hard to remember. The buzz-saw has its business, which is to tear a hole in things. If it is a weak, poor saw, it makes trouble and men curse at it. If it is strong and sharp and slick and clean, men curse it, too, but only those who run up against it. The buzz-saw does not reach out after trouble. It simply is, and because it is men, when they get tired quarreling with themselves, quarrel with it. No buzz-saw can be a buzz-saw and not cut. When it won't cut, it is cast on the scrap-heap and is sold for junk-iron.

This is what I get out of it: Each man is born to go through life and carry with him his own striking personality. He may be "peculiar", as others see him, but if he is true to himself—his character—everything about him will be symetrical, harmonious and true. Whatever he does will be stamped with his personality. The very man breathes in and through his work. His joys, his sorrows, his aims and ambitions; his heart, his soul, will speak to you in what he does. He lives a moment at a time; whether you find him in light or in shadow; in toil or at ease, he is the same man. Thus are all men when they are fulfilling God's purpose.

But take that man and let him hide himself under a cloak of popular custom; let him force his personality down, check this "peculiarity" and lop off that; let him think and say and do and be just what his friends will please, and, presto! What have we? Just a hand-me-down! A piece of man from the scrap-pile—something that has been discarded because it failed to do its work. The personality is gone; only the man animal remains. What a pity!

LANDRY'S LETTER

By GRACE G. BOSTWICK

(Copyright, 1904, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

I FELT horribly sorry for Katherine when Landry died. It must have been an awful blow, for she seemed to lose every bit of her spirit and went about pale and listless for months.

You see, Landry was a fine fellow, an unusual fellow. I don't believe there was a selfish fiber in the man's whole make-up. He was essentially big-hearted and lovable. Homely in feature to positive ugliness, he was still attractive in appearance. He was famous in a small way as the author of certain delicate love sketches, very tender and dainty in sentiment, and so unlike him as to seem inconsistent with what we knew of his character. A right jolly good fellow, with plenty of sense and a cheerful lot of brains under his sandy poll.

He and Kit had been engaged for a long time, and I knew that he fairly worshiped her, though he was very quiet about it. I felt a mild sort of envy, for I had never plumbed the depths of love myself. I'd had my little affairs, but I always hated myself during their progress, because I couldn't really feel—I was only amused and entertained, never touched. My friendship with Kit was the one real sentiment of my life, for we had been like brother and sister for ten years. Ever since she had begun to yearn for long skirts and put her pig-tails up into the crown of womanly dignity. Whenever Landry was away I took his place at her side, and jolly good times we had, and many of them.

A few months before Landry's death Kit semed to change some way. She took to mooning about for all the world like a disappointed lover. Landry, too, went into the dumps. He grew thin and pale and more impersonal than ever. He was very tender with Katherine, and so I knew that it was no lover's quarrel that was wearing on them. She sort of clung to him as though she felt him slipping from her, and I've sometimes thought since that she must have had a premonition of what was coming.

One morning, on my way home from an all-night vigil, old Damon lost his head and I came a pretty cropper. It wasn't far from home, as luck would have it, and I managed to get to the house. I was pretty much used up, taking my weariness and the shaking-up together and my knees shook as if I'd been officiating at my first operation. Afterward, when Kit came in to see me, I tried to laugh it off, and I jollied her up.

"Landry 'll be good and jealous if you don't watch out,' I told her. "I believe you're in love with me, old girl." Her face flamed a sudden crimson over its old pallor, and she looked at me sharply. Then I caught her hand and pulled her down to me. I kissed her, as I always had, and for a moment she laid her face against my cheek.

"What if you'd been killed?" she whispered. "What if you'd been killed?"

"You'd still have Landry," I retorted, and Kit slapped me. It wasn't the first time by any means, for you see we'd been boy and girl together. I couldn't help seeing that her eyes looked funny. A new expression, I'd never seen there before—and I wondered.

It was shortly after that poor Landry came down with typhoid. It was a hard case from the start. Sometimes it gets a grip on a man and an M. D. can see that there's no hope whatever. Thank goodness, we were all there with him. He wasn't alone, as he had been the greater part of his life—since he'd been a little chap, in fact. He wasn't lonely. Sometimes it seemed to me that he was happier than I had ever seen him. I felt that he was glad to go, and I couldn't understand it. It broke us all up, every one of us, for we loved the poor fellow.

I found her on the veranda one evening, alone in the soft darkness. I felt a bit down myself. Things weren't going very well, and I began to think that I was not fitted for a professional life after all. I felt too sorry for my patients. I couldn't give a judicial, impersonal sympathy, as a physician must to be among the ranks of the successful. Every death that came under my notice worked on my mind to such a degree that it unfitted me to care for the living.

She took my hand and held it tightly both of her own. I felt a sudden tightening at my heartstrings, and a rush of tenderness swept over me.

"Lonely, old girl?" I asked softly.

"Oh, so lonely, Freddy—so lonely—you can't know," and she drew my hand up to her face and leaned her lips upon it.

"Poor heart," I said, and I bent and laid a gentle kiss on her forehead. She turned her pale, luminous face up to me, wistfully, like a child, and I kissed her warm, red mouth. Then my heart began thumping like a hydraulic ram and my hands trembled strangely. I tried to steady them. She would be so angry if she thought that I dared. I had kissed Katherine numberless times, as a man may kiss his sister, lovingly, tenderly, but absolutely without a thrill. They had never been like this. I was at a loss. I had never dreamed of Katherine except as my dear old friend—my manhood chum, and as for her—my heart sank, for I knew she had been utterly devoted to old Landry and mourned passionately for him. At least I thought so. If she knew what I was thinking she would hate me—loathe me, forever. If she knew—ah, if she knew. She sat there dreaming, her eyes, as I thought, on memory's distant mountain peaks; her dear, warm, brown eyes that I loved.

She turned to me with a little laugh.

"It's so nice to be loved a little," she said, as she nestled against my coat, as if she belonged there. I fought with myself a moment. She must have felt my heart beating. I was horribly ashamed. Then I suddenly lost my self-control, and stooping toward her, I took her in my arms and kissed her passionately, many, many times, passionately, eagerly, as I had never kissed anyone in my life—as I had never wanted to kiss anyone before. After a time I lifted my head and waited for the storm. I knew it must come. I felt like a whipped cur, though every pulse in my body throbbed with delight and joy. Whatever came, I knew now. I was blind no longer. They talk of love being blind. I say it's the other way about, it's love that clears our sight—so we can really see where we have always before being groping in a dim half-light.

She nestled closer in my arms and laughed a little, low laugh of contentment.

"Oh, Freddy, boy," she said, "I thought you would never wake up. I've been such a long, long time waiting to come home."

I started back and faced her in amazement.

"And—and Landry?" I faltered.

"Oh, my dear, I never loved Landry." (Ah, so I knew now why he was glad to go, poor duffer, poor, unselfish, loving old duffer.)

"He knew I didn't, but he—he—cared, and he knew I loved you, so he helped me. He told me you loved me, only you were asleep, and I've waited so long—so long for this," she sighed, happily.

I looked in her eyes incredulously.

"Kit, why in the name of common sense didn't you tell me?"

"Tell you? Freddy, how could I? I wasn't sure you—you cared, and sometimes I was sure you didn't. It was only because Landry was so positive that I dared to hope. I could only wait in silence, and since Landry died it has been so lonely, so drearily lonely."

"Poor old girl," I said in her hair, "poor darling old girl."

"You've lost a whole year," she cried, "a whole year."

"Then you knew a year ago?"

"Yes; it's funny, Freddy, but I couldn't imagine why no man ever moved me the least tiny bit. When Landry told me he cared, I tried to think I loved him, but he said then that I didn't, and afterward, he knew it was you. He watched my eyes, he said, when you were about, and when he told me that, I was as astonished as you were when I told you.

"When your horse threw you that time, then I knew beyond a doubt, for I suffered agonies thinking what might have happened. You were so ghastly that I was horribly frightened. I felt sure that you were at least maimed for life."

And then, she brought me the letter—Landry's letter, that was not to be delivered until I had found my own. Oh, that letter. If I had only seen it when Landry died. Kit would not have grown pale waiting for what was always hers.

"You confounded blind old bat," he wrote, "what in the name of all that's holy, do you stay around here for? If I was such an egregious donkey as you are I'd go off and die, but I've got to be the one instead—and I've got eyes to see. That's ever the way in this vale of tears.

"Well, you must know some time. It will come to you all at once, as the knowledge of it came to me—then, old boy, I wouldn't mind being in your boots. I'd give my life for that one hour as happily and freely as I'd toss a copper to a pickaninny. It can't be—so I give you my blessing and what little I can add to your future—though, of course, you know, I mean hers—and that is the fortune that I haven't been able to squander with all my idle worthlessness. Make her happy with it, if you can, and so I shall know I have a hand in her comfort after all.

"You weren't cut out for a pill-doper, old man. Drop it. Well, so long. 'Take keer of yerself,' and be good to her to make up for your cussed stupidity. Landry."

The name stared up at us in his well-known writing, and suddenly, an overpowering sense of his nearness mastered me. Kit reached out a trembling hand. I felt a shudder go over her and a mist obscured my sight for a moment. Then:

"Yes, yes," I heard her whisper, faintly, "I see you, dear, dear Landry."

WITH HANK REKLAW

Fear is man's worst foe. All of us are cowards when duty calls.

If you have anything to say, don't get behind a paper wall; be open and out with it.

The opponents to incorporation are so modest they decline to speak the naked truth.

There are many things besides tumble bugs that dislike to be turned away from dead things.

This old world would not be so sinful if there was more consecrated living and less preaching.

The practice of charity brings more love into one's heart than the gold of the world could buy.

The least any man can do for another, and perhaps the most, is to make him think well of himself.

To do anything well one must practice often. The same principle applied to happiness would wipe out all sorrow.

We may say what we will about matters of religion, but when we see a man with God in him it knocks the devil out of us.

No man need be afraid to hold an opinion different from that of the multitude, if he is honest in it and has enough sand to back it up with work.

When a man gets so steeped in bigotry that he thinks he can "buck a town to a finish" it is time he were looking for a soft spot to fall upon.

Fenelon tells us a wholesome truth in this: "It it necessary that the good should love you, that the wicked should fear you, and that all should esteem you."

The man who "bucks" at progress is not to be blamed any more than the man who falls into any other form of sin; but the people are to blame if they sit on the bank and watch him puddle in the pool of stagnation.

When one hears a preacher tell God so many things to do and leave undone, he finds himself wondering how Jehovah keeps track of it all. It seems as if God might do one thing if I ask him to, and mean it, but when so many things are asked, it doesn't seem possible to tell what is wanted, and I don't think God listens very attentively then.

She nursed a plant from the onion stage on through its leafy growth. It was rich in color and promise and the bud was opening into a beautiful flower. Friends pointed covetously to its beauty. In an unguarded moment it was exposed to the touch of life's frost; its leaves drooped, its flower fell, and what was its virtue was no longer recognized. The frost had done its work; its life was nipped, its beauty gone. How like woman! There is, however, this difference. We nurse the plant back into something of its first beauty, and try to forget it was frost-bitten; whereas, when woman's purity is blighted by lust we look with scorn instead of pity and cast out into the street instead of taking back the drooping one and placing her out of lust's way.

Birth and Immortality

By Dan S. Giffin, in The Segnogram.

A little child is born; a life begins to be
That never was before—a marvelous thing to see!
An yet so common that it seems not strange to me.

He grows to man's estate—he dies—and is no more!
'Tis said, his life begins upon another shore;
That death to life beyond, is but an open door.

Not near so wondrous is, that life which once has been
And ceased to be, should then commence to be again,
As is, that life which never was should once begin:
Why, then, need doubt that future life exists for men?

They were talkin' about who was and who wasn't, an' it seamed to me as if they all vras. Ennyhow they ought to uv been. Mister Truesdale said they wasn't. So did Misters Barnes, Kenny, Paul and Johnstone. Everything was wasn't with them, and what was could not be, whether or no. They were looking for tecknikalities; want to send 'em to Victoria to clog the wheels of progress. Don't know what they found, but it made 'em sour looking, and they smoked hard. Some fellers, they said, were not born soon enough, others were busy across the bridge when the paper was signed, and still others were down cellar, and therefore not in the city limits. They really did have a lively time. And when it was all over every man found himself just where he was six months ago. The next thing, a feller'll have to ast the royal five if he can be a British subject if he goes out of their sight for five minutes, without making an affidavit when he comes back.

In the Pulpits

What the Local Pastors Talked About Sunday

"For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." These words of Paul to the Romans formed the basis of Rev. Mr. Campbell's discourse in the Presbyterian church Sunday morning. These words, he said, illustrate how near Christ is to us in everything of life, how necessary He is to the soul of man, and to life itself. We can think of the world and our own relation to it independent of the life and the influence of any other great character that the world has had, but life—soul life—without Christ is not to be thought of. It is impossible. He is so closely associated with everything in life, here and hereafter, that to leave Him out means eternal death to the soul.

Much is said and taught on questions affecting man's present life, as if that were all, but the future is far more important, and upon our right concept of Christ will depend our welfare beyond the grave. If we are like him here, we will be like him there. We are to suffer trials, sorrows and sacrifices, for to be like him we must be men of sorrow and acquainted with grief. To be like him we must acknowledge him, we must own him before men. It is our privilege to honor him before our fellows, to speak his name and live his life.

Rev. Mr. Roberts took for his text Mark 2:14. The teaching of the Old Testament was "follow the law;" the teaching of the New, "follow Me." Christ calls men to leave the past and follow Him now. He sought to sympateize and to save, hence we have the call, "follow Me." The call may come at any time. "As he passed by, He saw Levi at the receipt of customs," and called him right from his business. We do not have to wait for the next revival meeting or even for the Sunday service, but while we are busy with the affairs of this life the call may come. Sometimes the spirit works without the agency of man, as in the case of some notable revivals. We must not neglect the call because we do not hear it from the lips of another. The call is personal. Christ asks us to follow no doctrinal teaching, sect or party, but Himself. The leaders in political life, or church life, might be removed, but the party or denomination would still remain; remove Christ and we have no Christianity.

Levi's response was ready obedience. He arose and followed. Business and pleasure are nothing when it comes to the all important question, am I a Christian? When God calls we must answer. Levi obeyed and became Matthew, Saul obeyed and became Paul. If we refuse, we may go down into the eternal separation, for "My Spirit will not always strive."

Retail Lumbermen's Combine

In the Winnipeg Free Press of the 28th ult., there is an important announcement respecting the decision of the Western Retail Lumber Dealers' Association to separate from the manufacturers after fourteen years of a amalgamation. This may be regarded as a portent of important changes in the lumber situation of the future. According to a statement of a prominent lumber manufacturer at the time the association was formed the lumber trade was in a desperate condition. The western country was in the midst of its struggle. The entire farming community was in debt. The retail lumber merchants throughout the country had large book accounts and small stocks of lumber. All the manufacturers were on the verge of ruin. Some of them were ruined. Altogether the situation was said to be as bad as it could be. At that time the proposal to organize the lumber interests of the West was met with much favor, and an agreement was entered into, said to have originated with the manufacturers. One of the stipulations was that the manufacturer was to sell to none except retailers, and all lumber was to pass through the hands of the latter. The exception was that the manufacturers could sell to the railways and to the government. Another object was the maintenance of reasonable prices, and a scale of prices was drawn up accordingly, subject to constant revision, and it was agreed that the retailer should sell at a price 20 per cent in advance of what was paid to the wholesaler.

One cause for this dissolution, if not the principle one, was the feeling in the country that a combine existed, which was unfavorable to putting a duty on American lumber, and that it was necessary to check it. The manufacturers claim, however, that it was not and never was a trust or combine.

In a number of interviews which appeared in the Free Press from dealers, the sentiment is generally favorable to the claims of the British Columbia lumbermen. One said:

"The supply in Manitoba and the territory tributary to Manitoba is strictly limited and growing less. The time will soon come when we will be almost wholly dependent on the West. The forests of British Columbia will be the great source of our lumber supply, and there is no known way of getting this lumber to Winnipeg cheaply."

Close Salmon Season

It looks as if the B. C. salmon fishers are going to be put out of business during the years 1906 and 1908. Notwithstanding the strong protests of the B. C. canners, it is reported from Ottawa that Hon. Mr. Perfontaine has decided to recommend the adoption of an order-in-council suspending fishing operations in British Columbia for the two years named. It is provided, however, in order that in the event of the American canners on Puget Sound not living up to the agreement, then the Canadian restrictions regarding a close season will be immediately removed.
