A CRITICAL EDITION OF FOUR ENTERTAINMENTS BY THOMAS MIDDLETON FOR THE DRAPERS' COMPANY: THE SUNNE IN ARIES (1621), THE TRIUMPHS OF INTEGRITY (1623), THE TRIUMPHS OF HEALTH AND PROSPERITY (1626), AND AN INVENTION PERFORMED FOR...EDWARD BARKHAM (1622)

by

CHRISTINA J. BURRIDGE
B.A., University of Leicester, 1972

A THESIS SUBMITTED IN PARTIAL FULFILLMENT OF THE REQUIREMENTS FOR THE DEGREE OF DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY

in
THE FACULTY OF GRADUATE STUDIES
Department of English

We accept this thesis as conforming to the required standard

THE UNIVERSITY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA
September 1978

© Christina J. Burridge 1978
In presenting this thesis in partial fulfilment of the requirements for an advanced degree at the University of British Columbia, I agree that the Library shall make it freely available for reference and study. I further agree that permission for extensive copying of this thesis for scholarly purposes may be granted by the Head of my Department or by his representatives. It is understood that copying or publication of this thesis for financial gain shall not be allowed without my written permission.

Department of ENGLISH

The University of British Columbia
2075 Wesbrook Place
Vancouver, Canada
V6T 1W5

Date 9 October 1978
ABSTRACT

This thesis presents a critical old-spelling edition of Thomas Middleton's three Lord Mayor's Shows for the Drapers' Company, The Sunne in Aries (1621), The Triumphs of Integrity (1623), The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity (1626), and the related An Invention (1622) for the Draper Lord Mayor, Edward Barkham. The general introduction to the edition sets these four pieces in the tradition of London civic pageantry. It discusses the history, nature, and organization of the Lord Mayor's Show and its social and political, as well as dramatic, context, concentrating particularly on the extent to which such shows can be said to represent the growing political independence of London. The importance, often underestimated, of the civic work to Middleton's career is demonstrated, and his contribution to the form summarized. The critical introduction to each text provides a detailed analysis of the entertainment, drawing on material in the Drapers' Company archives to examine the relationship between Company, dramatist, and others involved in the Show. Problems of production are accorded a special importance. The critical notes following each text explain specific references, relate images, ideas, and techniques to other works by Middleton and his contemporaries, and gloss difficult passages.

The texts themselves have been edited in accordance with the principles formulated by Sir Walter Greg, R. B. McKerrow, and Fredson Bowers. Each text is accompanied by: a textual introduction discussing the text and its copy, printing-house procedures, and any bibliographical problems. arising from this; a list of substantive changes; a textual commentary discussing such alterations, refusals to emend, textual cruces, etc.; a list of press-variants; a list of emended accidentals. A statement of editorial procedures follows the general introduction. An Invention is in MS and has therefore been treated more conservatively. The textual introduction outlines the history and state of the MS and the modifications of procedure followed.

Appendix I is a brief consideration of the printing of Lord Mayor's Shows. Appendix II consists of extracts from the Drapers' Company records relating to Middleton and the Shows he wrote for the Company.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Abstract</td>
<td>ii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Table of Contents</td>
<td>iv</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>List of Figures</td>
<td>vi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Preface</td>
<td>vii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INTRODUCTION</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I. 29 October: The Lord Mayor's Show</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II. The Genesis of the Lord Mayor's Show: the Procession of October 29, the Midsummer Watch, and the Royal Entry</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>III. The Development of the Lord Mayor's Show</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IV. The Lord Mayor's Show and Drama</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V. Audience</td>
<td>23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VI. The Lord Mayor's Show and its Authors</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VII. Devices, Machines, and Stages</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VIII. Actors</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IX. Finances and Organization</td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>X. The Political Context of the Lord Mayor's Show</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XI. The Drapers' Company in the Early Seventeenth Century</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XII. The Company and the Drama</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XIII. &quot;The Politics of Spectacle&quot;</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XIV. Middleton and Civic Pageantry</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes</td>
<td>86</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EDITORIAL PROCEDURES</td>
<td>100</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THE SUNNE IN ARIES</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Introduction</td>
<td>106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Introduction</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Text</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Apparatus</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Notes</td>
<td>152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes</td>
<td>168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Title</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THE TRIUMPHS OF INTEGRITY</td>
<td>172</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Introduction</td>
<td>173</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Introduction</td>
<td>189</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Text</td>
<td>196</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Apparatus</td>
<td>209</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Notes</td>
<td>212</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes</td>
<td>221</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THE TRIUMPHS OF HEALTH AND PROSPERITY</td>
<td>224</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Introduction</td>
<td>225</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Introduction</td>
<td>238</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Text</td>
<td>243</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Apparatus</td>
<td>253</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Notes</td>
<td>256</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes</td>
<td>267</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AN INVENTION</td>
<td>269</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Introduction</td>
<td>270</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Introduction</td>
<td>276</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Text</td>
<td>282</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Textual Apparatus</td>
<td>287</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Critical Notes</td>
<td>291</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes</td>
<td>293</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SELECTED REFERENCES</td>
<td>295</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APPENDIX I</td>
<td>308</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APPENDIX II</td>
<td>312</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>List of Figures</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I. Plan of London showing the traditional route of the Lord Mayor's Show</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II. Chrysanaleia: The Fishing Busse</td>
<td>36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>III. Chrysanaleia: The King of the Moors</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IV. Chrysanaleia: Merman and Mermaid</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V. Chrysanaleia: The Chariot of Richard II</td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VI. Londons Tempe: The Chariot of Oceanus, Tethys on a sea-lion, an Indian boy on an ostrich</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VII. Londons Tempe: The Lemnian Forge, the Field of Happiness, and the Palace of Apollo</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VIII. A Greenman; from John Bate, The Mysteries of Nature and Art</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IX. Title-page of The Sunne in Aries, Huntington Library copy</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>X. Title-page of The Sunne in Aries, National Library of Scotland copy (slightly enlarged)</td>
<td>105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XI. La Serre's engraving of the entry of Marie de Medicis (1638), showing the Cheapside Cross and the new Standard</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XII. Title-page of The Triumphs of Integrity, Huntington Library copy</td>
<td>172</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XIII. Title-page of The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity, Huntington Library copy</td>
<td>224</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XIV. Two pages of the Crane MS of An Invention</td>
<td>269</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>XV. Edward Barkham's crest</td>
<td>281</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
PREFACE

Middleton's entertainments for the Drapers' Company form a small part of the civic pageantry of Renaissance London. By the early seventeenth century the most significant of these public displays was the Lord Mayor's Show, a complex event whose development owed much to the various medieval and Tudor ridings and entertainments, especially the Mayor's inaugural procession on 29 October, the Midsummer Watch, and the Royal Entry. The introduction to this dissertation concentrates on the historical, social, and political, as well as the dramatic context of civic entertainments in general and Middleton's for the Drapers in particular. Detailed analysis of these latter works is reserved for the introduction to the individual pieces, The Sunne in Aries (1621), The Triumphs of Integrity (1623), The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity (1626), and An Invention performed for...Edward Barkham (1622).

Except for these four entertainments, all quotations from the works of Middleton are from A. H. Bullen's edition (London, 1885); these have been checked against the original texts. I have substituted the modern use of i/j and u/v in quotations from Middleton's contemporaries and have expanded all MS contractions and abbreviations in the extracts from Company records quoted in the introduction, but have otherwise retained the spelling and punctuation of the originals. Those entries from the Drapers' Company records relating to Middleton's work for the Company are transcribed, according to Malone Society procedures, in the Appendix.
I am greatly indebted to the Drapers' Company for its generosity in financing much of my graduate work and for permission to use its archives and library during my research. In particular, I wish to thank the Company's Education Officer, Mr. Robert Brown, for his kindness in providing me with copies of documents and for his constant interest in my project. My thanks are due also to my advisor, Professor Joel H. Kaplan, whose help and encouragement at all stages have contributed greatly to the final result. Lastly, I wish to acknowledge the assistance of Professor S. K. Heninger, Jr. and Mr. Roy Stokes in checking information and offering advice.
INTRODUCTION

Search all chronicles, histories, records, in what language or letter soever; let the inquisitive man waste the dear treasures of his time and eyesight, he shall conclude his life only in this certainty, that there is no subject upon earth received into the place of his government with the like state and magnificence as is the Lord Mayor of the city of London.

Thomas Middleton

The flamboyant hyperbole of Middleton's claim reminds us that the Lord Mayor's Show reached its zenith in the thirty-five years from 1605-39, a period corresponding approximately to the growth of London's consciousness of itself as a metropolis, a centre of political, financial, and cultural life, able to compete with any in Europe. The unparalleled magnificence of the Show became a visible symbol of London's prosperity and effective government; as another writer of the Show, Thomas Dekker, explained: "London in Forraine Countries is called the Queene of Cities, and the Queene-mother over her owne....As thus in State, shee her selfe is Glorious; so have all our Kings held it fit to make her chiefe Ruler eminent, and answerable to her greatnesse." ¹

I. 29 October: The Lord Mayor's Show

The Lord Mayor's Show was, from its inception, the major public manifestation of this "greatnesse." Designed to celebrate the formal inauguration of the Lord Mayor on 29 October, it was organized and paid for by the City Company to which the new Lord Mayor belonged. As the Haberdashers' Court of Assistants expressed it succinctly in 1586, its function was "the honor of the Citie & worshipp of this Company."^2

To this, all else was subordinate. The triumph focused on three important events: the Lord Mayor's swearing of the oath at Westminster, the feast at Guildhall, and the thanksgiving service at St. Paul's. The three together signified the harmony of the external and internal relations of the City government, and the triumph, in theory if not always in practice, celebrated this. Essentially, this triumph was an elaborate procession whose various components were designed to honour the chief magistrate and, in so doing, entertain the citizens, uniting all in a festive occasion that fostered the Londoners' sense of community. One of the most important of these components was the semi-dramatic pageants, essentially processional tableaux vivants, which from the turn of the sixteenth century became both more numerous and complex. ^3

The basic elements of the procession remained the same from the early Shows in the mid-sixteenth century to that of 1639, the last Show before the Interregnum. In 1575 the day's events were described by William Symthe, a citizen and Haberdasher of London. The similarity of this procession to those fifty years later and the vivid detail of Smythe's account make it worth quoting in full:

The day of St. Simon and Jude he (the Mayor) entreth into his estate and offfice: and the next daie following he goeth by water to Westmynster, in most tryumph-like manner. His barge beinge garnished with the armes of the citie: and nere the sayd barge goeth a shyp-bote of the Queenes Majestie, beinge trymed upp, and rigged lyke a shippe of warre, with dyvers peces of ordinance, standards, penons, and targetts of the proper armes of the sayd Mayor, the armes of the Citie, of his company; and of the marchaunts adverturers, or of the staple, or of the company of the newe trades; next before hym goeth the barge of the lyvery of his owne company, decked with their owne proper armes, then the bachelers barge and so all the companies in London, in order, every one havinge their owne proper barge garnished with the armes of their company. And so passinge alongethe Thamise, landeth at Westmynster, where he taketh his othe in Thexcheker, beffore the judge there (which is one of the chiefe judges of England), which done, he returneth by water as afforsayd, and landeth at Powies wharfe, where he and the rest of the Aldermen take their horses, and in great pompe passe through the greate streete of the citie, called Cheapside. And fyreste of all cometh ij great estandarts, one having the armes of the citie, and the other the armes of the Mayors company: next them ij drommes and a flute, then an ensign of the citie, and then about lxx or lxxx poore men marchinge ij and two togeather in blewe gownes, with redd sleeves and capps, every one bearinge a pyke and a target, whereon is paynted the armes of all them that have byn Mayor of the same company that this newe mayor is of. Then ij banners, one of the kynges armes, the other of the Mayors owne proper armes. Then a sett of hautboits playinge, and after them certayne wyfflers, in velvett cotes, and chaynes of golde, with white staves in their handes, then the pageant of tryumphe rychly decked, whereupon by certayne fygures and wrytinges (partly towchinge the name of the sayd Mayor) some matter touchinge justice, and the office of a majestrate is represented. Then xvj trumpeters, viij and viij in a company, havige banners of the Mayors company. Then certayne wyfflers in velvet cotes and chaynes, with white staves as aforesaye. Then the bachelers ij and two together, in longe gownen, with crymson hoodes on their shoulders of sattyn; which bachelers are chosen every yeare of the same company that the Mayor is of (but not of the lyvery), and serve as gentlemen on that and other festivall daies, to wayte on the Mayor, beinge in nomber accordinge to the quantetie of the company, sometimes sixty or one hundred. After them xij trompeters more, with banners of the Mayors company, then the dromme and flute of the citie, and an ensigne of the Mayors company, and after, the waytes of the citie in blewe gownes, redd sleeves and capps, every one havige his silver coller about his neck. Then they of the liverey in their longe gownes, every one havige his hood on his lefte shoulder, halfe black and halfe redd, the nomber of them is accordinge to the greatnes of the companye whereof they are. After them followe Sherifffes officers, and then the Mayors officers, with other officers of the citie, as the comon sargent, and the chamberlayne; next before the Mayor goeth the swordbearer, having on his headd the cappe of honor, and the sworde of the citie in his right hande, in a riche skabarde, sett with pearle, and on his left hande goeth the common cryer of the citie, with his great mace on his shoulder, all gilt. The Mayor hath on a longe gowne of skarlet, and on his lefte shoulder, a hood of black velvet, and a rich coller of gold of SS. about his neck. Then all the Aldermen ij and ij together (amongst whom is the Recorder), all in skarlet gownes; and these that have been Mayors, have chaynes of gold, the other have black velvett tippetts. The ij Shereffes come last of all, in their black skarlet gowns and chaynes of golde.

The crucial difference between the Show as Smythe describes it and the mature seventeenth-century form is the vastly elaborated pageantry. In 1575 there is one tableau only, but in 1602 the Merchant Taylors arrange to have "a pageon[t], a shipp, a Lyon And a Cammell." Their next show, The Triumphs of Re-United Britannia (1605) by Anthony Munday, is still more elaborate, having four tableaux, each with a speech or dialogue. Hereafter, four or five tableaux are customary. Each of these was stationed at some point along the route from the Thames to the Guildhall and St. Paul's, and generally joined the procession after it had been seen by the Mayor. In 1591, with Peele's Descensus Astraeae, the pageantry included a water show, a tableau mounted on a barge which accompanied the Lord Mayor on his journey by water to Westminster and back. This quickly became an integral part of the celebrations; its elaborateness, however, varied from year to year.

The essentially conservative nature of the Lord Mayor's Show enables us to use Smythe's 1575 description as a supplement to Company records and the printed texts in order to reconstruct the day's events. The celebrations began early in the morning when the new Lord Mayor, accompanied by his predecessor and the most important members of the City
Figure 1: Plan of London showing the route of the Lord Mayor's Procession --- Traditional Stations

NEWGATE ST
LITTLE CONDUIT CHEAPSIDE CROSS STANDARD
ST PAUL'S
WALING ST
OLF FISH ST
BLACKFRIARS WHARF RIVER THAMES
PAULS WHARF THAMES ST
GUILDFORD
THREE CRANES WHARF
Companies, processed from the Guildhall to Three Cranes Wharf where they embarked for Westminster. There the Lord Mayor took his oath before the King or, more usually, his Justice. On the return journey he was honoured by salutes fired from both the shore and a gallyfoist (a barge laden with ordnance), and by the water show, in Middleton's Show of 1623 "a proper and significant Maister-peece of Triumph, called the Imperial Canopy, being the Antient Armes of the Company" (11.29-30). (The tableau is re-used by Middleton later in this Show, The Triumphs of Integrity.) The Lord Mayor and his entourage disembarked, usually at Paul's Wharf, and were joined by all the other participants who had meantime been breakfasting. The procession, following the order described by Smythe (that is, essentially one of ascending order of importance then began in earnest. In 1623 the first halt was in St. Paul's Churchyard where the Lord Mayor was entertained with "a Mount Royall, on which Mount are plac't certaine Kings and great Commanders...that were originally sprung from Shepheards" (11.37-9). This device was then carried at the rear of the procession and the Lord Mayor was "gracefully conducted toward the little Conduit in Cheape" (11.106-7) and the Chariot of Sacred Memory where worthy Drapers were represented under figures of their virtues. The final tableau of the "Fore-noones Triumph" took place near St. Lawrence Lane, from this complex structure, the Crystal Temple of Integrity, the Lord Mayor was instructed in the virtues and duties of magistracy. The afternoon was occupied by the Guildhall feast, after which the participants processed to St. Paul's for divine service, accompanied by the various tableaux of the pageant. These awaited the Lord Mayor afterwards, and, decked elaborately with torches and links, escorted him homeward.
This effect was often most spectacular: Middleton describes the gold, silver, and crystal Temple of Integrity "adorned and beautified with many Lights, dispersing their glorious Radiances on all sides thorough the Cristall" (11.195-7). On the way, at the entrance to Wood Street, the procession halted for the final tableau, the Imperial Canopy, previously seen in the water show. This represents a typical order for the day; variations, of course, were frequent. Sometimes different wharves were used, and this could affect the placing of the tableaux. On other occasions, as with The Triumphs of Truth in 1613, the pageantry might start earlier with a tableau stationed on the Lord Mayor's route from the Guildhall to the water. Essentially, however, the proceedings were governed by a mixture of convenience and custom.

II. The Genesis of the Lord Mayor's Show: the Procession of 29 October, the Midsummer Watch, and the Royal Entry.

The seventeenth-century Lord Mayor's Show had its roots in two other celebrations of the dignity of London's chief citizens, the Mayor's inaugural procession on 29 October and the Midsummer Watch. A further important influence on the development of the early Show was the Royal Entry. The first of these, the procession accompanying the Mayor when he went to take his oath before the King or his Justice, dates from King John's establishment of yearly elections for the office in 1215 and gave the Show its form. From the earliest days this procession to Westminster was a dignified affair; the Mayor being accompanied by the Aldermen, the senior brethren of his Company, and a variety of other dignitaries and officials.
By 1400 the procession was elaborate enough to require marshalls and minstrels. The opportunity for display can be gauged by the cost of Sir Robert Ottley's procession in 1436; the charges for clothing alone amounted to £100 and another £55. 13. 09½ was spent on the rest of the riding. At first the Mayor and his associates rode to Westminster along the Strand, but from 1422 it became customary to go by barge along the river. Middleton and the other pageant poets, following Fabyan and Stow, mistakenly attribute the establishment of this custom to a Draper, Sir John Norman. Again the display was magnificent, the barges were festooned with banners and pennants and draped with plumet. Norman's barge in particular seems to have made a great impression, its silver oars and general opulence were still being commented upon two hundred years later. However, the behaviour of those involved did not always correspond to the grandeur of the occasion. In 1483 the rivalry of the Skinners and Merchant Taylors over precedence resulted in loss of life; 150 years later in 1638 the Drapers' Company paid their bargemen 2/6 "for their extraordinary paines in outrowing the Lord Maiors Barge and landing the Company before the Lord Maior and Aldermen were landed (the Lord Maiors Barge being almost out of sight rowing towards Westminster before our Company tooke water)." This difficulty of ensuring an orderly progress to and from Westminster was a constant problem for the organizers. Despite its elaborateness, the procession did not include any pageants until the 1540s when the Midsummer Watch was in decline.

The Midsummer Watch was a combination of Midsummer folk festival, civic muster, and guild celebration. According to Stow it was instituted by Henry III "for the better observing of peace and quietnesse amongst his people" and was kept on the eves of the Feasts of St. John the Baptist and St. Peter, 24 and 29 June. The fusion of the various elements is well-caught in Stow's description of the event:

every man's door being shadowed with green birch, long fennel, St. John's wort, orpin, white lilies, and such like, garnished upon with garlands of beautifull flowers, had also lampes of glasse, with oyle burning in them all the night, some hung out branches of yron curiously wrought, containing hundreds of lampes light at once, which made a goodly shew, namely in new fishstreet, Thames streete, &c. Then had ye besides the standing watches, all in bright harnes in every ward and streete of this citye and suburbs, a marching watch, that passed through the principal streets thereof, to wit, from the little conduit by Paul's gate, through west cheape, by the stocks, through cornhill, by leaden hall to aldgate, then backe downe fenchurch streete, by grasse church, about grasse church conuide, and up grasse church streete into cornhill, and through it into west cheape again, and so broke up: the whole way ordered for this marching watch, extendeth to 3200. Taylors yards of assize for the furniture whereof with lights, there were appointed 700. Cressetes, 500. of them being found by the Companies, the other 200. by the Chamber of London: besides the which lightes every constable in London, in number more than 240. had his Cresset, the charge of every Cresset was in light two shillings four pence, and every Cresset had two men, one to bare or hold it, an other to bare a bag with light, and to serve it, so that the poore men pertaying to the Cressets, taking wages, besides that every one had a strawne hat, with a badge painted, and his breakfast in the morning, amounted in number to almost 2000. The marching watch contained in number about 2000. men, parte of them being olde Souldiers, of skill to be Captains, Lieutenants, Sergeants, Corporals, &c. Wiflers, Drommers, and Fifes, Standard and Ensigne bearers, Sword players, Trumpeters on horsebacke, Demi-launces on great horses, Gunners with hand Guns, or halfel hakes, Archers in coates of white fustian signed on the breast and backe with the armes of the Cittie, their bowes bent in their handes, with sheafes of arrowes by their sides, Pike men in bright Corslets, Burganets, &c. Holbards, the like Bill men in Almaine Rivets, and Apernes of Mayle in great number, there were also divers Pageants, Morris dancers, Constables, the one halfe which was 120. on S. Johns Eve, the other halfe on S. Peters Eve in bright harness, some overgilt, and every one a Jornet of Scarlet thereupon, and a chaine of golde, his Hench man following him, his Minstreis before him, and his Cresset light passing by him, the Waytes of the City, the Mayors Officers, for his guard before him, all in a Livery of wolsted or Say Jacquets party coloured, the Mayor himselfe well mounted on horseback, the sword bearer before him in fayre Armour well mounted also, the Mayors footmen, & the like Torch bearers about him, Hench men twaine, upon great stirring horses following him. The Sheriffes watches came one after the other in like order, but not so large in number as the Mayors, for where the Mayor had besides his Giant, three Pageants, each of the Sheriffs had besides their Giantes but two Pageants, ech. their Morris Dance, and one Hench man their Officers in Jacquets of Wolsted, or say party coloured, differing from the Mayors, and each from other, but having harnised men a great many, &c.

It is likely that the more entertaining aspects of the Lord Mayor's Show, the pageants, the giants, and the City Waits, as well as some of the organizational features, came from the Midsummer Show.

The arrangements for the Watch were, from its inception, in the hands of the guilds. In the early days they were responsible for providing the armed men and the cressets, but as the Watch became more elaborate the major City Companies seem to have taken an increasingly prominent role, making use of the occasion to honour their members who had achieved the office of Mayor or Sheriff, illustrate their history and associations, and generally entertain the citizenry. The earliest mention of pageants in the Watch makes it plain that they were provided by the Companies who provided the Mayor and Sheriffs. The first record of any pageants is from 1504 when the Drapers' Company paid £38. 13. 10½ "for xij pageantes for mydsomerwatch for the said Mair." The "xij" is most likely a scribal error. According to Stow the Mayor had three pageants and the Sheriffs two each, and even at the height of the Midsummer Show the Mayor had no more than four and each Sheriff three.

The pageants, as Stow says, were peripatetic, being "boren before the Mair" in the procession. They were generally on religious subjects, familiar from both the Royal Entry and the guild drama, although, as Sheila Williams points out, they seem to have been in "a discontinuous process of being secularized" throughout the early sixteenth century. Pageants were frequently made new, although ones from previous years were at times refurbished and made to serve again. In addition they were occasionally borrowed, along with the Giants, from religious guilds or other Companies. Characters in the pageants were generally played by children; however, adult actors and Company members also sometimes took part. The cast was also often supplemented by figures constructed of wire and paper. There is no evidence of speeches before 1541, although the children generally "played and sang" (MSC III, p.xxi-ii). If the meaning of the tableaux needed to be made clear, written inscriptions were affixed, but most of the pageants must have been very familiar to the spectators. In addition to the singing children, professional musicians were often hired for the pageant; these included players of virginals, regals, harps, lutes, shawms, and rebecks. By 1522 the Midsummer Show was impressive enough for Lodovico Spinelli, secretary to the Venetian Ambassador, to send home an enthusiastic account of it. All the tableaux he describes, except St. George and St. John the Baptist, were provided by the Drapers:

Next came another band of musicians, with 50 men and naked boys dyed black like devils, with the dart and buckler in their hands, goading the followers of Pluto, who was on a pulpit under a canopy seated on a serpent that spat fire; he himself being naked, with a drawn sword in his hand: so contrived that, when he brandished it, it made the serpent vomit very fetid sulphuric fire-balls: and on the pulpit in front of Pluto were figures of an ox, a lion, and some serpents.

Another band of steel-clad halberdiers marched next, preceding all the Prophets, with the tree of life sprouting from the belly of a recumbent male figure, and by certain mechanism the Prophets turned about from one side to the other.

They were followed by a band of halberdiers, next to whom came a platform on which was a castle accompanied by musicians, and within it some armed men, who as they moved caused the draw-bridges to fall and rise, and on the walls were men standing with stones in their hands for its defence against a Turkish horseman in pursuit, armed with a very long tin sword tinged with blood, who terrified those within, shouting in English ["wo be"].

Then came another band of halberdiers, followed by choristers on foot in white surplices, who preceded a stage on which was a very beautiful little girl under a canopy of brocade, representing the Virgin Mary, with four boys, also in white surplices, chanting "lauds"....

Next came a band of halberdiers with a stage, on which was Saint George, in armour, choking a big dragon and delivering Saint Margaret.

Then came a morris dance, followed by the Mayor, Sheriffs, and their entourage, and finally more pageants: "the isle of Patmos with Saint John the Evangelist and some towers, from one of which he was leaning, and beneath were two little boys" and "Herod at table, with Herodias' daughter, the tumbler, and the executioner who beheaded St. John the Baptist, who was represented as being in prison on the pulpit described above." Spinelli's account pays the Show a considerable compliment: "nor do I believe that anywhere else in the world a similar mark of rejoicing is usual."
Monmouth in 1536. Both of these were sometimes paid for by the Bachelors or Yeomanry of the Company whereas all the others were paid for by the Livery. Other pageants of theirs include St. Blythe, Achilles, the Story of Jesse, St. John the Evangelist, St. Ursula, and a King of the Moors and his pavilion. In 1522, probably as a result of Charles V's entry into London, they planned a pageant of the Golden Fleece.

The religious theme of most of these pageants suggests the possibility that the decline of the Midsummer Show in the late 1530s and 1540s may have been a result of an attempt to suppress them on religious and political grounds, paralleling the control and ultimate suppression of the Cycle plays in this period. The editors of Malone Society Collections III claim that the reason for the disappearance of the Midsummer Show was that its "principal features had been transferred to the day of the Lord Mayor's inauguration" (p.xxiii). But although this is what happened, it neither explains the reason for the transfer nor the reduction in pageantry in the early Lord Mayor's Show. And on the face of it this decision to transfer the pageantry to 29 October is strange, for from the point of view of both participants and spectators 24 and 29 June are eminently preferable days, given the English climate for outdoor civic festivities.

The official explanation was financial. During this period there were indeed complaints from members of the Companies concerning the expense, but this is so throughout the history of the Show. In 1541 the Wardens of the Drapers complained to their Court of Assistants "that they for evyr greater in tym after now Fayne to gyve v...Whiche hathe rysyne by a wanton and superfluows precydyence begun by mayres and Shereffes of the mercery/ And after the same so recyted The seyd Assistens sayd what remedy but go through wyth all."16 Furthermore, the Show of 1539 was suppressed by order of Henry VIII on the grounds of expense. Since, however, the citizens were not informed until two days before the Show was due to take place when all the money had already been spent, the King's explanation seems distinctly specious.17

This suggests that although there is virtually no firm evidence to go on, we may be justified in assuming that the overt religious content of most of the pageants, at a time when the crown was beginning to censor and restrict other forms of theatrical entertainment, in conjunction with the convenient excuse of their cost, caused their decline. P. D. Lusher has argued that the Drapers' pageant of the Assumption of 1534 provides an example of their dangerous political and religious implications.18 Instead of referring to it as a pageant of the Assumption as was usual, the Drapers' books describe it as "A pagentt of A ladye havying A Romayn M. gilt in her hond or A dyademee iiiij sqware with A grete M. at everye corner."19 Lusher argues that such an atypical description, coming a mere two months after the officers of the Company, along with other City dignitaries, had sworn to accept the illegitimization of Princess Mary, indicates a deliberate gesture of political support for her. This is almost certainly going too far; it is hard to imagine Henry ignoring such blatant defiance. However, even without the specific political reference that Lusher suggests, pageants of the Assumption were unlikely to be thought highly of by royal authority. It is noteworthy that among the early changes in the Cycle plays after the break with Rome is the abandoning of plays on this very subject.20
Under such conditions it is possible that the transfer and adumbration of the pageantry was a deliberately judicious move by the City Fathers to cut the costs of the Show, but at the same time retain it, in spite of any royal interference, as an integral part of City tradition. This would be consonant with the attempts by other municipal authorities to preserve their Cycle plays. For despite the complaints about the expense of the pageants, Londoners must have benefited commercially from them. As Dekker points out in the seventeenth century "besides all the twelve Companies, (every one of which is a gayner by this imployment:) it would puzzle a good memory to reckon up all those Trades-men (with other extraordinary Professions which live not in the City) who get money by this Action."

The fully developed Lord Mayor's Show of the seventeenth century also owes much to the Royal Entry, already a well-established ceremonial in the mid-thirteenth century. Indeed the earliest example of a trade pageant occurs in the victory celebrations for the Battle of Falkirk in 1298 when the Fishmongers had "4 storions [sturgeons] gylded caryed on 4 horses and after 4 horses caryed 3 samons of sylver and after xlvi knyghts all armed uppon luces of the water [pike] and St Magnus among the rest." The early Shows seem to have borrowed the subject matter of their pageants from the Royal Entry, but as they grew more complex, the relationship between the two ridings became one of mutual influence. This is not surprising in view of the processional nature of both, their common function of fostering a sense of communion between people and ruler, and the involvement of the Aldermen and leading members of the great Companies in their organization. Certainly in 1532 Hall comments that the City's preparations to accompany Anne Boleyn on the Thames to her coronation were of a similar nature to those it made for the Lord Mayor. After the 1604 Entry, however, the Lord Mayor's Show, by reason of its frequency and grandeur, eclipses its royal counterpart.

The most important differences between the two ridings were the early use of speeches in the Royal Entry (customary from the mid-fifteenth century) and its use of fixed rather than peripatetic stages. The introduction of speeches into the Lord Mayor's Show in the mid-sixteenth century opens up another area of influence in addition to organization and subject matter. And as the mayoral Show became more elaborate, stationary stages, sometimes built around the conduits and fountains used so often in the Entries were occasionally erected. With the advent of the printed description of tableaux and speeches we are in a better position to compare effectively the two ridings. Certainly the description of Elizabeth's Coronation was a direct source for Heywood's Londons Jus Honorarium (1631); more generally Sheila Williams has traced the influence of its style in Peele's pageants. The relationship becomes closer still in the case of James I's Entry, for of the three dramatists involved, Jonson wrote the speeches for the non-extant 1605 Lord Mayor's Show, and Dekker and Middleton were regularly employed by the Companies, and did, in fact, draw heavily on this initial experience with the pageant form in their mayoral Shows.

III. The Development of the Lord Mayor's Show

For a description of the Lord Mayor's Show in embryo we must turn to Henry Machyn's account of the 1553 Show. There is one pageant, that of St. John the Baptist the patron saint of the Merchant Taylors, transferred from the Midsummer Show to the procession of 29 October; by this time it has acquired some "goodly speeches." The procession itself with musicians, giants, greenmen, and a devil, is in essence the same as the later ones. By 1575 when William Smythe described the Show, the function of the pageant has already become formalized: "Then comes the Pageant of Tryumphe rychly decked, whereupon by certaine fygures & writinges, (partly towchinge the name of the sayd Mayor) some matter towchinge Justice, & the office of a majestrate is represented." In the next twenty-five years the show became largely secularized, with historical or mythological characters replacing saints; for example, Jason rather than the Virgin becomes the mainstay of Drapers' iconography. At the same time the number of tableaux increased from one to between four and six, sometimes including a water show, and the employment of men with a known theatrical background and interest in seeing their work in print became habitual. These last coincide with the increased willingness of the Companies to pay out large sums of money to honour their brethren and their city.

Speeches came late to the Lord Mayor's Show. We know that Machyn mentions that they were "goodly" in 1553 and that those for 1556 were written by "Mr. Grimbald," presumably Nicholas Grimald (MSC III, pp.39-40). In 1561, however, the Merchant Taylors preserved the speeches in their Books. Interestingly, these already correspond to the pattern described by Smythe in 1575; the Lord Mayor was William Harper, and accordingly such famous harpers as David, Orpheus, Amphion, Arion, and Iopas expound upon the nature of good government. Shortly after this we begin to get the names of authors more regularly: James Peele, father of George, devised the speeches for the 1566 show, and Richard Mulcaster those for 1568. In 1585 the pageant was written by George Peele, the first instance of the employment of a practising professional dramatist and also the first time that a printed text, The Device of the Pageant Borne Before Woolstane Dixi, survives. The coincidence is not completely fortuitous. From then until the cessation of the Shows in 1639 it becomes increasingly rare for someone outside the theatrical profession to be called in. Inevitably, this resulted in the dramatic sophistication of the pageants; the process, however, was not an evolutionary one, for the most "dramatic" of the seventeenth-century Shows are the relatively early Troia-Nova Triumphans (1612) by Dekker and The Triumphs of Truth (1613) by Middleton. Perhaps more important to the Companies was that their employment of the dramatists enabled them to draw on other aspects of these men's skill than the mere ability to write effective speeches, such as their familiarity with dealing with actors, stage business, props, and costumes.28

IV. The Lord Mayor's Show and Drama

The question of how far the pageants were "dramatic" is important, for of late the attempt to rescue the study of pageantry in general, and Lord Mayor's Shows in particular, from the confines of mere antiquarianism and to see these pageants in the context of the whole range of dramatic activity of the Elizabethan and Jacobean period has sometimes resulted in a distortion of their true nature. Stephen Orgel has insisted that we should not view the masque as "drama manqué," and the same is true of pageantry.29 As Orgel argues "drama exists in time: things happen and characters act on each other"; but this excludes most of the significant features of the Lord Mayor's Show. On the whole things do not happen, they are only expounded, and characters exist primarily only as static exemplars, not as figures capable of change. In short there is no sense of process, and little plot or dialogue. The emphasis instead is on spectacle and its exposition. Of course the Lord Mayor's Shows do have dramatic elements, sometimes, as in Troia-Nova Triumphans and The Triumphs of Truth, more pronounced than at other times, but never combined into a whole. Pageants, then, must be accorded their own laws; it is a distortion to use the extent to which they approach the dramatic as a criterion of their excellence. This is not to deny, as Glynne Wickham has so clearly demonstrated, that an understanding of pageantry is essential to an understanding of the development of drama during this period or that there are many correspondences between pageantry and the regular drama, but rather that, in dealing with the Lord Mayor's Show, it is essential not to forget that the occasion which it celebrated, its nature, its form, and its organization inevitably inhibited any truly dramatic action.

A major impediment to the dramatic development of the Show was the strict control exercised by the Companies. The day's triumphs were organized and paid for by whichever Company the new Lord Mayor belonged to. As the Haberdashers' statement quoted earlier suggests, the Companies had a clear idea of what they wanted and since they paid the piper they called the tune. Their increasing willingness to pay out large sums of money for these celebrations is as important for the development of the form as their employment of professional dramatists. Without this financial support, the proliferation in the number of tableaux and the growing elaboration could never have occurred. It is probably not coincidence that the most expensive Show before the Restoration, the Grocers' 1613 celebrations for Sir Thomas Myddleton, includes the most dramatic of the pageants, written by Middleton for his namesake, while one of the least dramatic (and one of the worst, although the two are by no means synonymous), Middleton's _The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity_ (1626), formed part of the cheapest triumph, that for Cuthbert Hacket, Draper. The Grocers paid out about £1300 of which just less than half was expended on the pageant itself; the Drapers spent £545. 13. 08 of which about one quarter went on the pageant (_MSC III_, pp.86, 110).

The heavy expenditure entailed constant supervision by Company officials; in a matter as important as the honour of the City and its own members, no Company would have relinquished much in the way of control to a representative of the dangerous profession of the theatre. On the whole, the Companies got what they wanted and were well-served by the men they employed; however, the extent of their control could not but inhibit innovation. For instance, as long as the tableaux were skilfully executed, the Drapers could be relied upon to be satisfied with ones featuring sheep and shepherds, or Jason and the Golden Fleece. Or, as Ben Jonson more disparagingly put it in his satirical portrait of Munday in _The Case is Altered_, "such things ever are like bread, which the staler it is, the more holesome." Certainly when the Companies complained, it was not on account of the tableaux per se, but rather the "ill performance there- of." In 1609 the Ironmongers objected that "the children weare not instructed their speeches...that the Musick and singinge weare wanting, the apparrrell most of it old and borrowed, with other defects" (_MSC III_, p.76). Similar considerations may have prompted the Drapers' complaints in 1626. In such cases, however, the Company had effective remedies; first it could withhold part of the payment and second, it could decline to employ the offending dramatist or artificer in the future.

A further limitation on the dramatic development of the Lord Mayor's Show was its occasional nature and its function as a celebration of the mutual social responsibilities of ruler and ruled. Stephen Orgel has argued that in the case of the masque it took the talents of Jonson to overcome the limitations inherent in the form, unify its disparate elements, and create a text independent of performance. This never happened with the Lord Mayor's Show, and one important reason why it did not was that its outdoor, peripatetic form made it very difficult, even if dramatist and Company had so desired, to achieve anything other than what Orgel calls the unity of a pageant-- that is, a variety of discrete devices, unified essentially by symbolic and thematic means rather than by dramatic interplay of character. It is no coincidence that the Royal Entry never developed beyond this point either, despite the disbursement in 1604 of vast sums of money and the employment of Jonson, Dekker, and Middleton. Jean Jacquot's comments on the essential diversity of the Royal Entry are equally applicable to the Lord Mayor's Show: "Le pouvoir monarchique se donne en spectacle à la cité; la cité se donne en spectacle au souverain-- et à elle-même car elle prend alors conscience de son unité, de son harmonie dans la diversité des responsabilités, des rangs, des professions. Les sentiments de fidélité et de protection, l'idée de concorde nécessaire au travail pacifique et à la prospérité ne s'expriment pas seulement dans un cortège solonnel aux costumes éclatants et accompagné de musique, mais pas des décors, des tableaux vivants commentés par des devises ou des discours. Since, in addition, the writers were obliged to celebrate the same event in very much the same way year in and year out they probably deserve congratulation for the changes they managed to ring on the basic themes and tableaux than criticism for their lack of invention.

The problem was still further complicated by other aspects of the occasion. The processional nature of both the Lord Mayor's Show and Royal Entry inevitably acted as a brake on the incorporation of dramatic action into the pageant form. Middleton tried to surmount this difficulty in The Triumphs of Truth (1613), to a modern reader the most interesting of and satisfying of the Shows, by using a morality-like structure to unify its parts. But it was an experiment that neither he (nor Dekker who attempted something similar in Troia-Nova Triumphans, 1612) ever repeated, and it is fair to consider that there were other grounds for this than the "dotage" suggested by David Bergeron. He argues that these first shows by Dekker and Middleton are praiseworthy because they are "an attempt to add dramatic value by giving the conflict between virtue and vice a significant, dramatized tension, not merely a visual statement." In comparison, the later shows are "sorely lacking": "rich in spectacle they may be, but the dramatic 'soul' is almost non-existent." However, it is arguable that this development of the dramatic "soul" was essentially at odds with the spectacular, occasional, and processional nature of the Lord Mayor's Show, that Dekker and Middleton recognized this, and so abandoned their initial experiments. Certainly one wonders how many people understood the innovations of The Triumphs of Truth; indeed as R. C. Bald comments, the sustained allegory of this pageant must have been "quite unintelligible to any except the Lord Mayor and those beside him."37

V. Audience

It is reasonable to suppose that given the conditions likely to prevail on the day—a good chance of bad weather and an enormous crowd—the effective part of the Show for most of those who watched it must have been the spectacle. Only those close to the Lord Mayor himself could have been assured of understanding the speeches, and whether they always listened very attentively may be doubted. This difficulty must certainly have been exacerbated by the turbulence of the crowd. The description of the triumphs of 1617, for which Middleton wrote The Triumphs of Honor and Industry, by Orazio Busino, chaplain to the Venetian Ambassador, makes it clear that the behaviour of the spectators was far from sedate:

On looking into the street we saw a surging mass of people, moving in search of some resting place which a fresh mass of sightseers grouped higgledy piggledy rendered impossible. It was a fine medley: there were old men in their dotage; insolent youths and boys, especially the apprentices alluded to; painted wenches and women of the lower classes carrying their children, all anxious to see the show. We noticed but few coaches and still fewer horsemen; only a few gentlemens coming in their carriages for a view at some house in the Row belonging to their friends or relations, for the insolence of the mob is extreme. They cling behind the coaches and should the coachman use his whip, they jump down and pelt him with mud. In this way we saw them bedaub the smart livery of one coachman, who was obliged to put up with it. In these great uproars no sword is ever unsheathed, everything ends in kicks, fisty cuffs and muddy faces.
From the windows an incessant shower of squibs and crackers were thrown into the mass beneath, for which the boys scrambled when they were cold. On surveying the windows along the street, as far as the eye could reach, we perceived sundry gallants in attendance on fine ladies...we were assured that the gallants were the servants of these ladies, which in plain language means their lovers....Some of our party saw a wicked woman in a rage with an individual supposed to belong to the Spanish embassy. She urged the crowd to mob him, setting the example by belabouring him herself with a cabbage stalk and calling him a Spanish rogue, and although in very brave array his garments were foully smeared with a sort of soft and very stinking mud which abounds here at all seasons.

When we read Middleton's description of these "noble Solemnities" we should not forget the reality of pushing, shoving, and revelry that lay behind them. For if the ridings were on one level the celebration of a mystic social communion, on another they had always provided for such as Perkin Revelour, the irresistible opportunity for a holiday:

For whan ther any ridynge was in Chepe
Out of the shoppe thider wolde he lepe-- Til that he hadde al the sighte ysein,
And daunced wel, he wolde nat come ayeyn--

The spectators are indeed one of the fascinating elements of the Show, for behind the desire to honour City and Company comes the intention of entertaining the citizens. The popularity of the Shows is adequately attested to by the decision to execute Sir Walter Raleigh on 29 October so "that the pageants and fine shewes might drawe away the people from beholding the tragoedie of the gallants worthies that ever England bred." The prime audience was, of course, the Lord Mayor and his retinue; however, they, in turn formed part of the show for everyone else. And indeed all London was there. The Companies were, in a sense, a microcosm of the society of the capital. Although essentially representing the established merchant class of London, kings, queens, and nobles belonged to them, while the humblest apprentice might aspire, in the tradition of London success stories, to rise through their ranks to the ultimate dignity of Lord Mayor. As Spendall in Greene's Tu Quoque exclaims "by this Light I doe not thinke but to bee Lord Maior of London before I die, and have three Pageants carried before me, besides a Shippe and an Unicorne." In keeping with this the triumphs were sometimes graced by members of the royal family; representatives of the Privy Council were always there, and fashionable society turned out to amuse itself by looking at everyone else. And the great mass of citizens were present since it was their show. Thus the devisers of the pageants had to please an audience of great social diversity, the "sharpe and learned" and those of "grounded judgements." Busino's description makes it clear that those of any social standing did not mingle with the crowds in the street but stationed themselves at the windows of houses along the route. This suggests that they may have found it difficult to hear the speeches (Busino makes no mention of them) or discern much of what was happening in the pageants. So it seems likely that Dekker and Middleton were right to stress that "The multitude is now to be our Audience, whose heads would miserably runne a wooll-gathering, if we doo but offer to breake them with hard words."

VI. The Lord Mayor's Show and its Authors

Although it is true that there are occasions when the pageant poets rely on formula-writing (Middleton's 1626 Show, essentially cobbled up from earlier ones is a case in point), on the whole they took their responsibilities seriously and produced effective pageants. "Inevitable monotony in spite of endless variations" is the comment of a modern reader, one who has read too many pageants too quickly to appreciate their diversity. Certainly if we turn to what the authors themselves had to say about what they were doing we find that they had a firm grasp of both the potential and the limitations of the form in which they were working. Dekker's comments on triumphs are especially illuminating:

Tryumphes, are the most choice and daintiest fruit that spring from Peace and Abundance; Love begets them; and Much Cost brings them forth. Expectation feeds upon them, but seldom to a surfeite, for when she is most full, her longing wants something to be satisfied. So inticing a shape they carry, that Princes themselves take pleasure to behold them; they with delight; common people with admiration. They are now and then the Rich and Glorious Fires of Bounty, State, and Magnificence, giving light and beauty to the Courts of Kings: And now and then, it is but a debt payd to Time and Custome:. And out of that debt come These.

(III, 230)

His clear realization that peace and abundance are necessary political conditions for the flourishing of such events is particularly interesting, for the Shows were abandoned when it became obvious that London's peaceable estate (Londini Status Pacatus was the title of Heywood's 1639 Show, the last before the Interregnum) was a myth.

Besides Dekker and Middleton the two major writers of mayoral pageants before 1639 were Munday and Heywood. Munday has had the misfortune to be maligned by both contemporary and modern critics. However, a careful reading of his pageants suggests that some, at least, of this criticism is misplaced. Sheila Williams comments that his pamphlets read "like the work of a man who is inventing the form of what he is writing as he goes along." This is true; the credit for a logically organized text appears to belong to Dekker. But this does not mean that Munday could not write a good pageant, simply that he had not learnt how to organize a written description of the event. In fact, one suspects that some of his pageants, especially for instance Metropolis Coronata (1615) with its speech and song from Robin Hood and his Merry Men and their request for further employment at Christmas, were found more entertaining by many of the spectators and even Company officials than some of the more pious moralizings of Middleton or Dekker. Munday, writing at the beginning of the heyday of the Show, has little interest in the theoretical aspects of the form; the same is true of Heywood writing at its close. In his case this may be the result of the reduced status of the writer, for, as in the case of the masque, by the mid-1630s the responsibility for the "devise" and "invention" of the pageant has clearly passed to the aritficer; in 1638 and 1639 the Drapers negotiate with John and Mathias Christmas who are made responsible for paying Heywood. By this time the texts were printed before the performance, but Heywood uses the freedom of no longer having to describe the tableaux in detail, not to explain the nature of triumphs but rather to display his erudition and expound at length the appropriateness of his rather idiosyncratic and recondite symbolism. Indeed Sir Morris Abbot (for whom Porta Pietatis, 1638, was written) may well have felt very grateful for an explanation of why he was to resemble a rhinoceros.

Middleton, however, like Dekker, is concerned to explain both what a triumph is and what it should do, but in his case the effectiveness of this is reduced by his determination to prove himself a better artist than his rival Munday. The opening to The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity (1619) shows that he had a firm grasp of what was required: "there is fair hope that things where invention flourishes, clear Art and her graceful pro-prieties should receive favour and encouragement from the content of the spectator, which, next to the service of his honour and honourable Society, is the principal reward it looks for" (VII, 315). The honour of the magistrate and the content of the spectator are not in themselves, however, sufficient; as Dekker had also emphasized, the enticing shape of the pageant is a means to an end--the instruction of both magistrate and people in their mutual duties: "Nor have these kind of triumphs an idle relish, especially if they be artfully accomplished: under such an esteemed slight-ness may often lurk that fire that may shame the best perfection. For instance what greater means for the imitation of virtue and nobleness can anywhere present itself with more alacrity to the beholder, than the memori-able fames of those worthies in the castle..." (The Triumphs of Honor and Industry, VII, 295). So the pageants of the Lord Mayor's Show are intended to function as miniature Mirrors for Magistrates, and it is as well to recall that the age genuinely believed in the potential of art to affect directly the moral behaviour of an individual. To us the pageant poets seem at times to be indulging in grossly unwarranted flattery; however, at a time when flattery was an accepted mode of expression, they were endeavouing (admittedly with varying degrees of success and little of Ben Jonson's literary ability) to be "mirrors of mans life, whose ends, for the excellence of their exhibitors (as being the donatives, of great Princes, to their people) ought alwayes to carry a mixture of profit, with them, no lesse than delight." And second in the manner described by Bacon, "a form due in civility to kings and great persons, laudando praecipere, when by telling men what they are, they represent to them what they should be."

VII. Devices, Machines and Stages

The devices on which the pageant poets relied were the familiar ones of medieval and Tudor theatre and entertainment. Variations on the mount, arbour, tower, fountain, and chariot abound in the Lord Mayor's Show; essentially, the skill of writer and artificer lay in the changes they could ring on these basic devices rather than in the invention of new ones. So, for instance, Middleton's Chariot of Honour in The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity (1626) seems unsatisfactory not because it is yet another use of a chariot, but because Middleton (although Christmas must presumably share some of the blame) has simply lifted the Chariot of Sacred Memory from The Triumphs of Integrity (1623), renamed it, and attached a speech which has little connection to the tableau. He has failed to invent a new fiction for an old device and the one he does provide, by its breach of decorum, draws attention to his lack of originality. The Drapers would have been justified if they had felt they had seen it before.

The continuity of tradition apparent in the devices and their importance for an understanding of Renaissance stagecraft have been well-demonstrated by George Kernodle and Glynne Wickham; accordingly I propose to examine only those devices used regularly by Middleton. The two most ubiquitous are the chariot and the mount/island; they appear in all his Shows. The popularity of the chariot in processions may owe something to the influence of the Renaissance triumphal parade, but it is more likely to have been adapted from the Court entertainments where it was in regular use by at least the 1540s. And of course chariots also appear on the public stage in plays like Tamburlaine and The Battle of Alcazar; one is listed in Henslowe's 1598 Inventory. For the Lord Mayor's Show the chariot provided an adaptable means of transport for a group of kings, worthies, virtues, or whatever, whether live or carved, particularly suited to a procession. It was generally drawn by the mythological or heraldic beasts, carved or made of lath and plaster, that were a constant element of the Show's attractions. Chariots in the Drapers' pageants were always drawn by two pellited (i.e. spotted) lions, the supporters of the Company's arms. The device itself could vary considerably in size from the scallop shell of Oceanus in Dekker's Britannias Honor (1628) to the massive chariot in Munday's Chrysanaleia: The Golden Fishing (1616) which contains at least nineteen figures. The chariot could also be combined with other devices: Dekker considers it to be synonymous with throne in both Troia-Nova Triumphans and Britannias Honor, a glance at the hierarchical arrangement of the seating in the Chrysanaleia drawing confirms the genesis of this.

The mountain is a basic device of early pageants, entertainments, tournaments, and the Cycle plays. Its symbolic possibilities are obvious; often it represents the commonwealth. The two mountains in the pageants for Prince Arthur and Catherine of Aragon in 1501 represent England and Spain respectively. It is used to particular effect in Elizabeth's Coronation Show where a green mountain and a barren mountain symbolize Respublica bene instituta and Ruinous Respublica. This device was consciously re-used by Heywood in Londons Jus Honorarium (1631). 55 Middleton's propensity for the mount/island can be explained by the dictates of the iconography of the Companies for which he wrote. Of his seven Shows three were written for the Grocers and three for the Drapers. The Grocers always expected a representation of the spice islands from which they derived their wealth and the Drapers were equally enthusiastic about their sheep. The mount/island is an obvious choice to fulfil both these requirements. Again varying degrees of elaboration are possible. In 1613, when the Grocers spent a small fortune on the Show, Middleton and his artificer produce five islands, a castle on the largest, middle one, and a ship as well; in 1617, when they spent less, they got only the Continent of India. For the Drapers Middleton uses the mount as an arbour on whose beauty "woolly creatures" graze, but it also appears as a mount royal for those shepherds who "rise to be kings" in The Triumphs of Integrity. In The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity (1619) the Parliament of Honour, a device which we might have expected to be of the sanctuary type is described by Middleton as "a Mount of Royalty."

Other important devices used by Middleton are the tower/castle, the fountain, and the sanctuary/pavilion. The tower is a common device in pageantry from at least the thirteenth century, especially at the conduits which provided appropriately semi-castellated structures for the artificer to base his designs upon. Like the mountain, the tower was often used in both medieval drama and later pageantry to symbolize the city or the kingdom. However, there are good grounds for thinking that the classical triumphal arches of James I's Royal Entry in 1604 affected the type of design. Certainly the descriptions of Middleton and Dekker often seem closer to a castle or temple than a tower. For instance, Britannia's Watch Tower in Britannias Honor (1628) is "a Magnificent Structure, Advancing itselfe from the Platforme, or Ground-worke upward with the Bewty of eight Antique Termes, By whose strength is supported a Foure square Building; The Toppe of which is a Watch-Tower, or Lanthorne, with eight Columnes of silver" (IV, 91).

The fountain is described by Kernodle as "perhaps the most protean of the scenic devices. On one occasion a symbol of a garden, on others it was an independent monumental and scenic form; at still other times it became an open pavilion, a castle, a temple, a grotto, a cross, a fleur-de-lis, an Agnus Dei, a tree, a triumphal arch, or a structure to support an upper stage or an orchestra of musicians." It was very popular in fifteenth-century Royal Entries when it was often built around one of the conduits, as for instance with Lydgate's three wells celebrating the return of Henry VI from his Paris Coronation in 1432. However, the fountain became less popular in later civic pageantry, appearing only some five times. Peele uses it Descensus Astraeae (1591), and Dekker has a Fountain of Virtue in the Nova Felix Arabia arch of The Magnificent Entertainment (1604), as does Heywood in Londini Artium & Scientarum Scaturigo (1632). Middleton uses it The Sunne in Aries and The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity. None of the texts of these pageants includes much in the way of description of the device; this may be because of its familiarity rather than the dramatist's lack of interest.

Like many of the other devices, the elaborateness of the sanctuary varies; at one end of the scale is the simple pavilion, sometimes containing a throne, and at the other is such a complex neo-Grecian structure as the Temple of Integrity in The Triumphs of Integrity whose crystal appearance is the visual embodiment of the moral purity of its occupant. At times the sanctuary closely resembles the tower/castle, doubtless this owes much to the influence of classicism in architecture. The Booth sketch of Dekker's Pallace of Apollo from Londons Tempe (1629) gives some idea of the appearance of such structures (see p.41). One interesting feature of this sketch is the existence of curtains. This corresponds to their use in earlier drama as in the "cowncel hous" of the Ludus Coventriae. The curtains were presumably used on occasion for discoveries or scene changes. The fog which covers London's Triumphant Mount in The Triumphs of Truth seems to be a curtain device and it is possible that it was by this means that the Temple of Integrity opened at "fit and convenient Times."

Curtains, however, were among the simpler spectacular effects of the Lord Mayor's Show. Again the continuity of tradition between medieval drama and entertainment and later theatre and pageantry is apparent. The mechanical marvels in the Shows range from the gold-spotted laurel tree that "shoots up" from the top of the Pageant of Several Nations in The Triumphs of Honor and Industry to the Globe of Honor in The Triumphs of Honor and Vertue "which Globe suddenly opening and flying into eight cants, or distinct parts, discovers in a twinkling eight bright personages most gloriously decked, representing (as it were) the inward man..." (VII, 365). This opening globe was an especially popular device, being used by Dekker, Webster, and Heywood as well as Middleton. The basic machine used to contrive these effects was the vice or windlass, presumably usually concealed in the framework of the structure. By the late fifteenth century such machines were in regular use in the Cycle plays, Royal Entries, and entertainments; indeed, there is nothing mechanical in the Lord Mayor's Show that cannot be paralleled in the pageants for the reception of Catherine of Aragon in 1501. However, it is also probable that the development of elaborate scenic machinery for the masque affected the Lord Mayor's Show. Certainly Garret Christmas' special effects in The Triumphs of Integrity seem to resemble some of those contrived by Inigo Jones for Oberon.

Most of the tableaux joined the procession after they had done their part in welcoming the Lord Mayor. The exceptions to this practice are rare. Sometimes, as in Dekker's Forlorn Castle from Troia-Nova Triumphans, the stability of a fixed stage seems to have been desirable and the Little Conduit provided an effective backdrop to the stage-castle. At other times the devisers wanted to use architectural features or symbolic associations of particular buildings and so incorporated these into a tableau, as in that at the new Standard in The Sunne in Aries. The continuing use of the peripatetic stage is clearly a survival from the earlier Midsummer Show when the pageants were "boren befor the Mair"; it is perhaps surprising that the advantages of a fixed stage were so rarely drawn upon, but one reason for the reliance on the earlier type must have been the added spectacle which this gave to the procession--after all the heart of the show. There is a strong possibility that the use of fixed stages became more common towards the end of the period; at any rate the texts are less specific about this, and some of the more elaborate tableaux are likely to have been stationary. Nonetheless, the continued payments for "Land-carriage by porters" confirm that most of the tableaux were still carried around in the procession.

Although both devices and tableaux were of the traditional type it is not always easy to visualize what they looked like. The task is made easier by the existence of two sets of drawings. The first, preserved in the Fishmongers' Company archives, and reproduced in John Gough Nichols' edition of Chrysanaleia is the most useful, providing detailed representation of almost every aspect of Munday's 1616 pageant. The second group, the sketches made by Abram Booth, secretary to the delegation of the Netherlands East India Company, of Dekker's Londons Tempe (1629) gives a reliable general impression of each tableau, but the details by no means always correspond to Dekker's description. The two sets, however, in conjunction with details gleaned from Company records and the texts themselves, provide a necessary counterpoise to the wilder flights of imagination of many of the critics who have considered the problems of the appearance and transport of the pageant structures. Students of the Lord Mayor's Show have generally either failed to treat these difficulties or have produced theories that contradict the evidence of the drawings; drawings which they frequently reproduce.
Figure 2: Chrysanaleia: The Fishing Busse
Figure 3. Chrysanaleia: The King of the Moors.
Figure 4: Chrysaneleia: Merman and Mermaid
Figure 5: Chrysanaleia: The Chariot of Richard II
Figure 6: Londons Tempe. The Chariot of Oceanus, Tethys on a Sea-Lion, and an Indian boy on an Ostrich
Figure 7: Londons Tempe. The Lemnian Forge, the Field of Happiness, and the Palace of Apollo.
It is clear from the Chrysanaleia set that the tableaux were mounted on a cubic structure, the "Quadrangle frame" mentioned by Munday in Chruso-thriambos, the Triumphes of Golde (1611, sig. A4). The obvious purpose of this was to provide a raised playing area; it presumably superseded the hogsheads required in the early Shows (MSC III, p.46). The continued use of this frame is confirmed on the whole by the Booth sketches. In addition it may have provided an area in which the sometimes complex machinery for the tableau could be concealed. I am unable to find any convincing authority for the assertions made by J. G. Nichols, Sheila Williams, and Glynne Wickham that the space was used to conceal either wheels, horses, or men. Nichols claims, in discussing the Chrysanaleia Fishing Busse, that "it was drawn along the streets upon wheels, which were hidden by the dependant curtains." The wheels are an interesting possibility; although there is no mention of them in contemporary accounts, their use would be a logical way of easing the problem of transportation. The curtains are improbable, being scarcely warranted by the drawing which suggests, as would presumably be necessary, a more solid base for the pageant, after all a rather heavy structure. Sheila Williams, more justifiably, sees the plates as indicating "the extensive, indeed almost entire use of porters," but her inference from this, that the cubic structures could conceivably conceal horses but more likely the porters, is equally suspect. It seems clear from Dekker's description in 1612 that the tableaux were normally carried openly by the porters. This is confirmed by Company records: in 1610 the Merchant Taylors pay 100 porters £12. 10. 00 for carrying the pageants, apparently three major tableaux and some animals. Porters cost the same Company £10 in 1612 (MSC III, p.85); presumably again a large number were required. So many men are unlikely to have been concealed within the structure.

Glynne Wickham also deals with the problem of moving the pageants. He claims that the heraldic beasts of the Companies' arms "were taken out of their normal setting and used again and again in lifesize or larger re-creations to conceal the men who pulled the pageant-wagons through the streets or rowed them on the water," but while such a procedure may sometimes have been followed, it would seem to have been unnecessarily cumbersome. In the case of the water show the tableau seems usually to have been mounted on a gallyfoist and it is unlikely that there would have been any need to conceal the oarsmen. Similarly, the evidence for the procession points overwhelmingly to the open pulling or carrying of pageants and beasts through the streets. Wickham reprints a good selection of the Chrysanaleia drawings, but there is nothing in any of them to confirm his assertion. Indeed, the drawing of the merman and mermaid who pulled the chariot suggests precisely the opposite. And it is probable that the heraldic beasts generally bore a greater resemblance to the leopard from Chrysanaleia than to Wickham's description.

The only contrary evidence comes from Dekker's Troia-Nova Triumphans, a pageant particularly interesting for the insight it offers into conditions of production. Almost all commentators on the Lord Mayor's Show have noted its importance, but few have endeavoured to determine its precise significance. Most, like David Bergeron (who is conspicuous for lack of interest in production matters), are content to remark that "certain changes in production are taking place." The crucial passage describes the Chariot of Neptune:

Before this Chariot ride foure Trytons, who are feyned by Poets to bee trumpeters to Neptune, and for that cause make way before him, holding strange Trumpets in their hands, which they sound as they passe along, their habits being Anticke, and Sea-like, and sitting upon foure several fishes, viz, two Dolphins, and two Mer-maids, which are not (after the old pro-creation), begotten of painted cloath and browne paper, but are living beasts, so queintly disguised like the natural fishes, of purpose to avoyd the trouble and pestering of Porters, who with much noyse and little comlinesse are every yeare most unnecessarily imployed.

(III, 232-3)

Unfortunately, the meaning of this passage is not completely clear; the mind boggles at deciding exactly what sort of "living beasts" (horses? men?) were "queintly disguised" as dolphins and mermaids. The extract does confirm that porters normally carried the pageant structures through the streets, and also suggests that the early pageant figures were rather crude affairs of cloth and brown paper. Perhaps the reference is simply intended to stress the life-like qualities of these particular dolphins and mermaids in contrast to the older, cruder ones, but this would presumably still entail the use of porters. Whatever the precise form of Dekker's innovation, it did not succeed in displacing the porters; even for this Show the Merchant Taylors found it necessary to employ a large number of "porters which carried some part of the shows" (MSC III, p.85).

And in this year there was another tableau, the Forlorn Castle, which, being built on a stationary stage, definitely did not require porters. Twelve years later, in 1624, porters are still clearly the rule; Webster draws attention to the use of horses to pull the Chariot of Kings in Monuments of Honor: "for Porters would have made it move tottering and improperly." Even after the Restoration payments to as many as one hundred porters are not infrequent.

However, Dekker was evidently right in commenting on the growing sophistication of the devices and figures throughout the period. As Jean Robertson has pointed out, the credit for much of this belongs to Garret Christmas, who, unlike most of his rivals, was an architect and carver rather than a painter. This was recognized by Heywood who extravagantly compared him to Augustus finding Rome built of brick but leaving it built of marble: "So he who found these Pageants and Showes of Wicker and Paper, rather appearing monstrous and prodigious Births, then any Beast (presented in them) in the least kind imitating Nature: hath reduc't them to that solidity and substance for the Materialls, that they are so farre from one dayes washing to deface them, that the weathering of many Winters can not impeach them: and for their excellent Figures and well-proportioned lineaments, (by none preceding him) that could be sayd to bee paralleled."

There are no exact indications of the sizes of the tableaux given in either texts or Company records, and the danger of estimating this from the drawings is obvious. However, L. J. Morrissey has produced reasonably accurate dimensions for the wagons of the post-Restoration Lord Mayor's Show. His intention is to provide an alternative estimate to Richard Hosley's of the size of medieval pageant wagons, arguing that the physical conditions (narrow streets, etc.) and the inherent conservatism of pageantry make it reasonable to suppose that the wagons of the post-Restoration show "were not significantly different in structure and size from those that moved through the streets of medieval London." This is debatable, but it is much safer to assume, given the reliance of the Companies on precedent and the impossibility of further developments during the Commonwealth, that the dimensions of the pre-Restoration wagons were close to those used after. Morrissey argues that the typical wagon was rectangular, approximately 8 by 14 feet, with a structure (chariot, arbour, etc.) "filling most of the eight-foot front to a depth of three or four feet, with the stage stretching out behind." He concludes "square wagons 8 feet by 8 feet, or at most 10 feet by 10 feet, and rectangular ones 8 feet by 14 feet with structures on them from 6 to 12 feet high, and certainly under 15 feet, would have been extremely maneuverable by porters in the narrowest streets."

VIII. Actors

It has been generally accepted that the roles in the pageants were usually taken by children (MSC III, p. xxxi). Certainly children seem to have taken part in all the Shows from the mid-sixteenth century until 1639, and at times, as in 1566, 1568, 1585, 1602, and 1604 undoubtedly took the speaking roles. In 1609, however, Munday, while suggesting that the use of children was customary, had reservations about their effectiveness and indeed seems not to have used them. In the text of Camp-bell or the Ironmongers Faire Field he comments on their limitations: "the weake voyces of so many Children, which such shewes as this doe urgently require, for personating each devise, in a crowde of such noyse and uncivill turmoyle, are not any way able to be understood, neither their capacities to reach the full height of every intention, in so short a limitation for study, practise, and instruction." It should be noted that the Ironmongers complained this year that "the children weare not instructed their speeches" (MSC III, p.76). Despite such disadvantages, firm evidence of the participation of adult actors is scant. In 1611 the Goldsmiths "required" their brother John Lowen, a King's Man, to play Leofstane in Chruso-thriambos and in 1639 the Drapers paid William Hall, a member of the King's Revels, for "musicke and actions" and one Mumford (John Mountsett?) for "feates and Actions." The editors of Malone Society Collections III think that these payments were for a separate entertainment that was not part of Heywood's Londini Status Pacatus; however, David Bergeron has suggested that Hall took the role of Orpheus.

Nevertheless, there is some indication in Company records that, especially at the height of the Lord Mayor's Show, adults were more often involved than has generally been realized. So in 1613 the Grocers distinguish twice between children and players, in 1624 the Merchant Taylors arrange dinner for the men and children of the pageants, and in both 1629 and 1635 the Ironmongers differentiate between children and speakers.
It seems likely that as the Shows became more elaborate, the major roles, at least, were more often taken by adults. Unfortunately, the responsibility of writer and artificer in the seventeenth century for most matters of production has obscured the identity of those involved. In the late sixteenth century the children came from schools such as St. Anthony's, St.
Paul's, Westminster, and Merchant Taylors', but after 1602 they are identified only as "the children of the pageants." Some may well have been the offspring of Company members, as was sometimes the case with both the Midsummer Show and the post-Restoration Lord Mayor's Show, although since the provision of children was generally the author's responsibility, it is possible that those children with speaking roles had some professional training. It has proved similarly impossible to determine whether the men and speakers referred to in Company accounts were professionals or associated in some way with the Company.

IX. Finances and Organization

The organization of the Show as a whole was directly controlled by the Company involved. The arrangements made by the different Companies of course varied somewhat, but ultimate responsibility generally lay with the governing body, the Court of Assistants. The most common procedure, which was followed by the Drapers, was for the Court to undertake the initial arrangements and then delegate all further responsibility for the procession and pageants to a committee or committees appointed by it. This as a rule included the senior representatives of the Bachelors or Yeomanry who were largely responsible for the financing of the celebrations. The choice of tableaux, writer, and artificer lay either with the Court or with the committee; they sometimes formulated their wishes and appointed a writer and artificer to carry them out or, at other times, accepted tenders from interested parties. Whatever the exact procedure, the important point is that the choice was directly controlled by the most powerful men of the Company. The Drapers' Court of Assistants in 1621 appointed the Master, the four Wardens, and two senior members of the Livery "to take viewe and consideracion of suche plottes & thinges as are offered to be presented to this Companie by severall persons touchinge the pageantes and shoues" (p.320). It was presumably this committee that was responsible for accepting the proposal of Middleton, Christmas, and Munday. In 1623 and 1626 the Court ordered that "the fower Master wardens shall take present course for the fittinge providinge and compoundinge for of all things as shalbee fitt and necessarie for or towchinge the said showes and triumphes" (p.331). From this point on, responsibility for overseeing the making of the pageants and organizing the procession was transferred to the Wardens of the Bachelors.

The decision as to the exact means of financing the whole affair also lay with the Court of Assistants, as did the final authorization of the expenditure. Again, it is important to note that although the Bachelors paid in one way or another for the triumphs, the most important procedural decisions belonged to the governing body. The Companies, according to their individual traditions and circumstances, used a variety of means to raise the necessary money. The most common was the levy on those Bachelors appointed to serve in the procession, with heavier fines for any who refused. A variant on this was a fine levied on all members of the Bachelors, with additional dues from those who participated in the procession. In addition certain Bachelors might be raised to the Livery on payment of a set amount. Other methods included the carry-over of surpluses from previous years and contributions from the Livery or Court of Assistants.
The Drapers seem generally to have collected between 1/3 and 1/2 of the necessary money from raising eight to ten of "the fittest and most sufficient persons of the yeomandry of this Company selected out and admitted by the Master warden of this Company into the Livory of the Company every of them payinge before hee bee admitted the accustomed fyne of xxvj xiij iiiij" (p.331). In 1615 the Court of Assistants authorized the admitting of ten at the same rate, and in 1621 the Wardens' Accounts record the payment to the Wardens Bachelors of "the moneys received of such as weare lately taken into the clothinge the some of CCC towards the defrayinge of the charge of the showes & triumphes for the day Sir Edward Barkeham lord Mayor tooke his oath at Westminster" (MSC III, pp:100-101). In 1623 for Martin Lumley's triumph the Court authorized the entry of eight to ten Bachelors to the Livery, but, in the event, twelve were admitted, thereby raising £320 (p.332). In 1626 the same procedure was followed for Cuthbert Hacket, the Court of Assistants first suggesting the raising of some six or eight Bachelors, but finally accepting ten.

The bulk of the rest of the money for all the Drapers' Shows was raised by nominating and fining Bachelors to serve in either foynes (the skin of the beech marten) or budge (lambskin with the wool dressed outwards) in the procession. In 1614 forty were appointed to serve in foynes and forty in budge; in 1621 thirty-nine serve in foynes and thirty-two in budge. In 1623 the forty-two in foynes paid £122. 10. 00 and thirty-three in budge £98. 10. 00 (total: £269. 10. 00, p.335). If these two methods were insufficient, any surplus from the previous year's entry fines was made over to the Bachelors, or the Court itself might make a contribution, as in its gift of £50 in 1623. In addition, the Livery generally paid the cost of beautifying the new Mayor's house, provided cakes and wine for its barge, and on occasion paid part of the trumpeters' fees.

The problem of financing the celebrations was frequently a thorny one. From the days of the Midsummer Show until the changes that took place in the early eighteenth century members of the Companies complained, with varying degrees of bitterness and effectiveness, about the cost. The Grocers experienced the worst difficulty in getting their Bachelors to pay up; doubtless this was due, in large part, to the expensiveness of their triumphs. Certainly every Show of their between 1613 and 1639 met with grumbles and often refusals to pay. The Drapers, despite having eight Lord Mayors between 1614-40, had less trouble than might be expected. Their reluctance to accept Edward Barkham into their number in 1621 because of this very problem was a special case—for once the entire Company, Assistants, Livery, and Bachelors were in complete agreement. More usually the opposition came only from those who had to pay, the Bachelors. For instance, in 1623 the Company had to resort to the sanctions of the Lord Mayor: the Wardens' Accounts note the payment of 2/6 "to Mr. Atkins for his attendance at the hall when divers obstinate young men refused to pay their fines and be Conformable to the charge for the Lord Maiors Showes" (p.333). This may indicate the general lack of enthusiasm for providing Martin Lumley's triumph so soon after Edward Barkham's. Somewhat surprisingly, there is no indication of any reluctance to pay for Cuthbert Hacket's in 1626; this may have been because he was Master of the Company at the same time, but more likely because the Company, presumably deliberately, contrived to keep the expenses down to £545.13.08. In the late 1630s the complaints begin again, but A. H. Johnson is probably right in seeing this as part of the larger problem of collecting dues of any kind from the Bachelors who were increasingly at odds with the political sympathies of leading members of the Company.\textsuperscript{90} Undoubtedly, one reason for the relative infrequency of complaint during the 1620s was the Court of Assistants' awareness of the "state" of the Bachelors and its willingness to provide for their "better ease" by keeping costs down and even contributing themselves.

In most Companies, including the Drapers', the Wardens of the Bachelors were responsible for organizing the Show in accordance with the general principles laid down by the governing body. From the time preparations were started, frequently a mere five or six weeks before 29 October, they worked hard to arrange all the details of the procession.\textsuperscript{91} The payments for "diverse dinners and meetinges whilst we satt and weare dayly employed in the busines" were well-earned (p.341). As Sheila Williams points out, the routine choice of tableaux and the awarding of contracts to the same individuals eased their position, but their lack of previous experience must have been a handicap;\textsuperscript{92} hence the keeping of full and meticulous accounts which served as hand-books and guides to bargaining for their successors. It is unfortunate that for Middleton's Drapers' Shows all details of the production of the pageants are dismissed in these accounts by making the writer and artificer responsible for "all Chardges incident to those showes" (p.329). The remaining items deal primarily with the procession, excluding the pageant, for which the Company itself undertook all the organization. Despite this we do learn a certain amount about the pageants' production from the accounts, and, moreover, the rest of the information sheds valuable light on the celebrations as a whole. This can provide a useful corrective to our tendency to consider the Shows as more literary/dramatic than they in fact were.

The exact responsibilities of writer and artificer appear to have varied from year to year. As a rule, however, either together or separately, they were paid a lump sum for devising, making, and decorating the tableaux, providing child and adult actors, together with their costumes and props, and land and water carriage. In addition, they seem sometimes to have provided musicians for the pageant, greenmen and fireworks, breakfast and dinner for the children, and to have arranged printing of the text. The Drapers' records are less specific than many of the other Companies' about these duties; however, a full contract exists for Dekker and Christmas' Londons Tempe (1629) which gives a thorough account not only of their responsibilities but also of some of the spoils. The two contracted with the Ironmongers' Company to provide a sealion, two sea horses, an ostrich, Lemnion's forge, the Tempe or Field of Happiness, and the Seven Liberal Sciences. For this they demanded £200 which theis present conceived to be an overvalue, and thereupon offered them £180 which they accepted of for the making and finishing of the said Pageants to be furnished with Children and Speakers and their apparell and necessaries thereunto belonging. Landcariage by Porters; Watercariag by boats and Watermen as is accustomed. The Green-men with their Fireworks; the Musicke for the Pageant; And to give the company 500 bookes of the declaracion of the said Shewe And the Comittees demanded that the Sea Lyon
The 2: Sea horses & the Estridge (after the Solemnity) there to be sett upp for the Companies use, whereunto Mr Crismas excepted but was contented to deliver backe the Sea Lyon and the Estrige, and desired to retaine the Seahorses to himselfe. All the rest he undertooke to performe for the said some of 180\(^1\) effectually and sufficiently to the Companies Liking In witnes whereof they have herunto subscribed, Tho: Dekker,
Garett Chrismas,

(\textit{MSC III, p.115})

Records of other Companies confirm that on occasion a Company kept and sometimes re-used particularly spectacular components of a tableau, while others were kept by the artificer who presumably remodelled them.\(^93\)

It is again unfortunate that the custom of paying a lump sum makes it almost impossible to determine what was spent on what and how much profit both writer and artificer could hope to make. Undoubtedly the bidding system entailed working to a tight budget; this is confirmed by occasional requests for extra money.\(^94\) A. M. Clark, without giving any authority for the statement, claims that Heywood netted £10 a year from writing the Shows; this figure is almost certainly too high.\(^95\) The division of labour between poet and artificer seems to have varied according to the experience of the individuals involved and the development of the Show itself.\(^96\) In the early days the artificer was the most important, frequently devising the tableaux before a poet was hired to write the speeches. This is clearly a result of the relative novelty of having speeches at all; however, as these became an integral part of the Show and as the writer became prepared to take on more of the organization, functioning essentially as a producer, he achieved primacy. But the long successful career of Garret Christmas and his sons redressed the balance. There are signs of this in Londons Tempe (1629) where Dekker, despite his joint contract with Christmas, claims only to have "written" the show and praises his partner for its "invention" (IV, 97, 112). By 1638 all the organization is in the hands of the Christmas brothers who are responsible for paying Heywood. The pageants for the Drapers in the 1620s, however, bespeak a mutually harmonious relationship between Middleton and Christmas which reflects at the same time the development of the show to "a point where each of the component items needed to be considered as part of a single artistic scheme, not only in its own particular terms of reference." In contrast to the quarrel of Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones over the masque, the relationship between the writer and artificer remained harmonious throughout all its fluctuations. This is a measure not only of the men involved, but also of the reduced stakes: "les poètes qui composaient les vers pour le cortège du Lord Maire ne semblent pas avoir considéré comme l'âme des pageants leurs vers de bons ouvriers des lettres—et Garrett Christmas non plus n'avait pour ses constructions de prétention pareille."

While writer and designer took responsibility for all aspects of the pageant, the Wardens Bachelors, in addition to keeping an eye on their progress, organized the procession. In the 1620s this was in essence the same as that described by William Smythe in 1575. From their point of view the major headache was the poor men, to the number of between 70 and 100, who had to be provided with caps, gowns or coats in the Company colours (red, azure, and yellow for the Drapers), banners, javelins, and staves, and watched carefully to see that they did not evade their responsibilities; hence the provision of dinner (usually in Blackwell Hall abutting on to the Guildhall) to keep them together during the feast. Similar precautions had to be taken for the children and the trumpeters. These poor men were the nucleus of the procession; in addition to them were the standard-bearers, the Bachelors previously deputed to serve in foynes or budge, and the gentlemen ushers or rich whifflers.

A variety of means was used to keep the procession—and the crowds—in order. The Company generally paid the City marshall to provide men for this purpose and sometimes paid a marshall of their own as well. In addition the Drapers' Bachelors' Accounts mention payment to several poor men who were given the difficult task of keeping "the Crowde from of the Company as they went in the street" (p.355). More spectacular, if less safe, were the sword players and the greenmen with their fireworks. The Drapers regularly paid Thomas Jones, Master Swordsman, for his men to clear the way, twenty-five in 1621, twenty-five again in 1623 and eight in 1626. They are perhaps a survival of the military aspect of the Midsummer Watch. Another survival, the greenmen, were to judge from contemporary references, one of the most popular ingredients of the entire Show. These seem sometimes to have appeared in the guise of giants or devils as well as the more conventional attire illustrated here. They used squibs and fireworks to clear the way, apparently sometimes with unfortunate effects: "Come there a Pageant by/Ile stand out of the greene mens way, for burning my vestment." Another account claims that they "put the people in such a feare,/That some their hose anoy'd there."
Figure 8: A Greenman
Music in the procession was provided by a band of trumpeters, most often the King's, and the City's drums and fifes. The City waits, who had originally marched in the procession, were from the early 1600s stationed along the route, usually on the porch of St. Peter's, Cheapside. In addition, there was often music for individual tableaux. Some Lord Mayor's Show's, for example Metropolis Coronata, Troia-Nova Triumphans, and The Triumphs of Truth, include songs in the printed texts; for others, Company records confirm that musicians were hired to play for specific tableaux. So in 1623, the Drapers' Bachelors' Accounts note payments to "a little boye a drumer of the Argoe," "a fiffe for the Argoe," and "a little boy a drumer in Middletons shewes" (p.338).

Analysis of the Drapers' Company records suggests that the men employed to work on the Show fall into two categories. Some, such as Thomas Hinxman the caper, or Tilbury Strange who provided the gallifoist and John Richardson who supplied greenmen and fireworks, are employed year after year whatever the Company. Others, such as William Uffington the waxchandler and Edward Snowden the upholster, seem to owe their employment to their either belonging to the Company or being closely associated with it. Of course, the categories do, to some extent, overlap. Anthony Munday's son Richard, who like his father was a freeman of the Company, was employed year round, as well as at pageant time, in painting and renewing banners and pictures; he was also employed by other Companies, such as the Grocers, for similar work. The question is important since it has sometimes been argued that certain of the writers and artificers were hired because of their Company connections. Undoubtedly one of the many reasons for the employment of Munday was his membership of the Drapers but the precise significance of this cannot be determined; more clearly Webster seems to owe his employment in 1624 to his membership in the Merchant Taylors' Company. Similarly, Francis Tipsley, the artificer of Squire's Tes Irenes Trophaea or The Tryumphs of Peace (1620), was like the Lord Mayor a Haberdasher.

X. The Political Context of the Lord Mayor's Show

I have already suggested that it was no accident that the increasing elaborateness of the Lord Mayor's Show coincided with the growth of London's awareness of itself as "the flower of cities," metropolis coronata. In this respect, of course, the Show is not an isolated phenomenon. As Muriel Brad­ brook puts it "a new sense of metropolitan community established itself, closely joined to a new self-consciousness about the nature of theatrical experience. These two kinds of awareness developed together." However, the precise extent to which the Shows can be said to reflect the aspirations and tensions of the City is open to question. On the one hand, Frederick Fairholt, one of the earliest students of mayoral pageantry, claimed that."in former times, these pageants and their allusions, connected themselves in no small degree with the history of the country, and its political movements; and shadowing forth as they do, the opinions of the metropolis, they are worthy of more attention than may be at first imagined...." In conscious opposition to this, A. M. Clark has argued that "Their 'history' is lore from the past, rather than the events of a sixteenth- or seventeenth-century present; and their 'politics' are purely conventional" and that this must considerably qualify Fairholt's assertion. Nonetheless, Fairholt is right: recent studies of pageantry have emphasized the importance of "the politics of spectacle," analysing the ways in which it could be directed to consciously political ends. The Lord Mayor's Show does not stand aloof from this; indeed the very conventionality of some of the rhetoric is of political interest in itself. In a general sense, the pageants as an expression of London's pride in itself are necessarily a political gesture, albeit one that is not always easy to interpret, while at the same time individual pageants or tableaux may also reflect on contemporary situations. In addition, the maturity of the form coming, as it does, in the 1620s and 1630s, a time when social and political relationships were undergoing changes of considerable complexity, gives an added impetus to the need to determine the precise significance of the pageants in historical and political terms. The importance of this general issue for the three Shows Middleton wrote for the Drapers is twofold. First, between 1614 and 1640 the Drapers provided eight Lord Mayors and so were in a position to exercise considerable influence over City politics; and second, Margot Heinemann in an important article on Middleton has argued that his "Parliamentary-Puritan sympathies" were in close accord with those of his City patrons, some of whom may have been instrumental in protecting him from any unfortunate consequences of the Game at Chess affair.

It is necessary, therefore, to consider the political outlook of London, and the extent to which the Drapers' Company reflected it, in the period leading up to the "Eleven Years Tyranny" of 1629-40. The role of the guilds in this is of great interest, for they supplied most of the officials of City government; however, their influence has been relatively little studied. The difficulty here is that, if the Drapers' records are anything to go by, the Companies studiously avoided commenting on current events unless they touched directly upon their trading and financial interests. This makes it hard to determine the political and religious affiliations of both individuals and the Companies themselves. These, in any case, given the political complexities of the time, were inevitably far from precise. This difficulty of categorization should be remembered; it was quite possible to be both strongly Puritan and strongly royalist at the same time, and moreover, shifts of emphasis within any individual position were common.

The government of the City was essentially tripartite. The most "popular" body was Common Hall, an electoral assembly made up of the Liverymen, summoned and dissolved by the Lord Mayor. The legislative body was Common Council, theoretically elected by the freemen at the wardmote; in fact the Court of Aldermen exercised considerable authority over both the elections and its legislative power. The most powerful of the assemblies was the Court of Aldermen: "Chosen for life from among the wealthiest citizens, by the indirect election of the Aldermen themselves, the Court was oligarchic and almost self-perpetuating." Basically, then, the administration of the City was in the hands of an oligarchical group of the most powerful members of the Livery Companies. The great mass of shopkeepers, artisans, and apprentices had little influence on its government. It is hardly appropriate to call the City fathers "tradesmen"; the days when such as these had been closely connected with the trade of the guild to which they belonged was long past. By the turn of the sixteenth century they were the great merchants of the time and had little in common with small masters and journeymen. Their eminence, as R. H. Tawney points out, was due to their "versatility as economic pluralists," active in overseas rather than domestic trade. The most powerful of them, the Lord Mayor, was "the master of the mysteries of trade, the steward of the kingdom's stock, the perfect merchant." Inevitably then, the ties between City and Court were close, and this was compounded by the City's dependence on the Crown for its chartered privileges. Within this, of course, there was room for individual variations, some of the City fathers had closer ties of family, business, and patronage than others. In addition the ascendancy of Lionel Cranfield, City merchant turned royal servant, from 1616-24, despite his personal unpopularity, gave the trading interest a highly placed spokesman, thus mitigating James I's unease at dealing with the financial community. Cranfield saw clearly that "political stability had as its condition a prosperous economy and a contented City"; hence the necessity to include its views in formulating policy, if the government were to be able to draw on its wealth without unduly antagonizing it.

During the 1620s, however, the religious tenor of the Court of Aldermen was moderately Puritan, and this inevitably brought its members into conflict with the King and Privy Council: "as late as 1629 the City government openly supported activities which smacked strongly of Puritanism, notwithstanding the fact that the City was subject to continual pressure from two high places, the Privy Council and the Bishop of London.... That the City continued for ten years to support Puritan projects in the face of opposition from the King, Privy Council, Archbishop, and Bishop indicates strong Puritan motivation among the Aldermen. The most important of these projects was the financing of the St. Antholin's lectures; in 1621 the Lord Mayor, Edward Barkham, for whom Middleton wrote The Sunne in Aries, appointed a committee to consider providing a "competent supply of mayntenance toward the dayly exercise of preachinge every morning at six of the clock at St. Antholynes." This committee included three other patrons of Middleton, Sir Thomas Myddleton, Peter Proby, and Martin Lumley and recommended a grant of £40. However, this gesture of Puritan sympathy was modified somewhat by the increasing attempts of the Court of Aldermen between 1622 and 1630 to impose control over the lectures, especially over the right of appointment. Other indications of Puritanism include the appointment of preachers, especially for occasional sermons, and attempts to enforce sabbatarianism, this last involving a conflict of jurisdiction with the Bishop of London in 1629. Nevertheless, it is dangerous to overstress the implications of this. The Puritanism of, say, Sir Thomas Myddleton was far removed from the sectarian activity of a Grocer journeyman, and does not necessarily imply hostility to other government policy. The peace of 1604 was well-received by City merchants and, although by the 1620s when the cause of international Protestantism was more obviously at stake, opinion had shifted towards war, the enthusiasm of the Companies was not noticeable when it came down to paying for men and munitions for England's entry into the war. So although many merchants favoured a naval war with Spain on mercantilist grounds, Cranfield was not the only one to prefer peace.

Another reason for not over-emphasizing the Puritanism of the Court of Aldermen is the relative speed with which its attitude changed in the 1630s, despite considerable continuity of personnel. This is most obvious in religious affairs, in part due to the increased efficiency of discipline in the diocese of London after Laud took over, and is demonstrated by the Corporation's willingness to contribute to his projects. In political affairs differences with the Crown grew more serious, not surprisingly given the crude attempts to extract money from the City, but as the years of personal rule continued a general realization is apparent among many of the leading members of London government that ultimately their interests lay with the Crown. Valerie Pearl assesses the situation accurately: "Charles I enjoyed throughout his reign a small but powerful nucleus of support in the City government ... in particular the most influential section of the aldermanic Bench and probably of the Court of Common Council, although unwilling to commit themselves to support Charles in 1640, preferred to back the Crown by the autumn of 1641 and ... substantial changes in the City government were needed to give power to the supporters of Parliament."

The main differences in policy between government and City, other than over religion, were essentially financial. The 1620s were a period of marked decay in trade, and concern over this united both Livery and Yeomanry of a Company like the Drapers, closely involved with exports. Cranfield described the situation in 1621: "the City undone; the trade of the kingdom lost; the merchants, to use their own term, 'bought and Since no one knew the precise cause of the decline, it was natural, and often justified, to blame inept government policy. The importance of this to the Drapers may be judged by Tawney's claim that "three-quarters to nine-tenths of the value of London exports were estimated under James to consist of woollen textiles." This unsatisfactory situation was exacerbated in 1625 by the uncertainties of the new reign, the outbreak of the plague, and the subsequent failure of the harvest.

Given the decay of trade, the attempts of the Crown to tap the wealth of London, especially when Parliament was recalcitrant about voting supplies, were much resented. Since the reign of Elizabeth, the Crown had claimed to collect Corn money and enforce loans by right not grace; however, where Elizabeth almost invariably repaid eventually the money she borrowed, the first two Stuarts were both less scrupulous and more desperate, and some of their financial expedients were dubious in the extreme. The Companies' objection to the loans at least, however, was not always on the grounds of principle, rather their reluctance and occasional refusal to pay should be seen as attempts to get better terms and increased security for their money. More damaging to harmony was the Crown's attitude to the problem of concealed lands and the Companies' Irish holdings. However, the chief hostility to government policy before 1640 did not derive so much from the semi-oligarchical governing bodies of the greater Companies and the City government itself. Rather, this stemmed from the Companies' lesser members, especially the Bachelors, on whom the demands of the Crown for money fell more heavily, from the minor Companies, and from those Londoners outside the Companies who resented their privileges.

XI. The Drapers’ Company in the Early Seventeenth Century

The position of the Drapers as the third of the London Companies and their growing isolation from the craft aspects of the wool trade contributed to their apparently increasing support for the King. Although in the 1620s such important members as Edward Barkham, Martin Lumley, Allen Cotton, and John Ranye seem to have been among the more strongly Puritan section of the Aldermanic Bench, by the late 1630s the Company was clearly in the hands of royalist sympathizers. Then a succession of four royalist Masters, two of whom, Morris Abbot and Henry Garway, were also Lord Mayors (in 1638-39 and 1639-40) made the Company relatively acquiescent to the demands of the King. In comparison to some of the other Companies, especially those where the craft element was still strong, the Drapers paid their contributions without much demur. The Company historian, A. H. Johnson, suggests, however, that this acquiescence was in large measure a result of the control over the Company exercised by the Court of Assistants. He speculates that, given the hostility of Londoners evident at the 1638 entry of Marie de Médicis, mother of Henrietta Maria, Abbot’s mayoral triumph (Porta Pietatis by Heywood) cannot have been received with much enthusiasm by them either.

The connection of the Drapers with drapery per se had long been in decline. Originally manufacturers of woollen cloth, by the fifteenth century they had become primarily retailers of it and, in accordance with this trend, soon were closely involved in the export not only of wool and cloth but also corn and other staples. Throughout the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the number of members who had no connection with the trade grew to the point where, by the reign of James I, "the Company is rapidly coming to be composed, as it is to-day, of a motley group of men of numerous professions and callings, whose only bond of union is to be found in their common association in one Fraternity--a Fraternity, or Company, which is rapidly assuming the character of a mere Friendly Society." This increasing diversity affected the organization of the Company. By the mid-fifteenth century the split between the Bachelors or Yeomanry and the Livery or Clothing was almost complete. The Bachelors were a subordinate organization composed of small shopkeepers, retail dealers in cloth, tailoring and haberdashery, and journeymen of other trades; the more successful of them or those with connections in the Livery were from time to time called to the senior organization, having usually first served as Wardens of the Bachelors, unless the expenses of a mayoral triumph made it desirable to admit more to the Livery than usual. The liverymen, on the other hand, from whose most powerful members the Assistants were drawn, were essentially merchants, frequently involved with the joint-stock companies and with overseas trade. Several indeed had their principal residences overseas, primarily in the Levant.

The reign of Elizabeth had been a difficult one financially for the Drapers; the 1585 records claim "nothing remayning of value to showe in store but deedes of charitie and too savage Lawe and souche like Comparisons," but by the end of the century, partly as a result of judicious investment in joint stock companies, the situation improved and the Drapers, along with the majority of the other Companies, felt increasingly inclined to spend their surplus funds on feasts and pageants. This willingness was, as I have already argued, a sine qua non for the development of the Show itself, and must have been partly due to the rise in membership of the Company which spread the burden of cost more equably. In 1603 the Livery, including the Master, Wardens, and Assistants, totalled 116; this number sunk to a mere 71 in 1612. But by 1621 the Livery was at its largest with 136 members. Figures for the Bachelors are harder to come by because regular records of Quarterage payments (their annual dues) were not kept before 1617; it was, however, a much larger organization than the Livery, although the great majority of members were not active in Company affairs. In 1574 487 paid Quarterage. This compares with 617 (out of a total of 2,106) in 1617 and 644 in 1619. But numbers declined again in the mid-1620s as a result of the plague; probably another reason for the relative inexpensiveness of Cuthbert Hacket's triumph. Certainly in 1626 the Livery had declined to 108 members. No figures are available for the Bachelors, but as they would presumably be more susceptible to death by the plague, their losses were probably proportionately higher. The numbers did not rise again in the 1630s, due in part, as Johnson suggests, to the political unrest--membership of a Company made one more liable to the demands of the Crown.

XII. The Company and the Drama

The attitude of the Drapers and the other Companies to the drama is of considerable interest. It is, of course, a critical commonplace that the City fathers were hostile to the drama, but this view needs some modification. One of the valuable aspects of Margot Heinemann's study of A Game at Chess is her insistence that Puritans were not opposed "root and branch" to the drama, and moreover that some, including Middleton's City patrons, were aware that properly controlled, it could be an effective means of propaganda. In the early years of the sixteenth century, the halls of the City Companies, like the halls of the nobility and gentry, were regular playing places for groups of players. The Drapers records reveal that "companies of players were engaged to perform a play after dinner on both Monday and Tuesday in every year between 1515 and 1541 in which dinners were held." After this, dramatic activity at the Hall seems to have declined enormously, doubtless for a variety of reasons including lack of money, the growth of Protestantism, and the increasing hostility towards drama. By the 1570s and 1580s, of course, the City government had become the spearhead of the attack on permanent acting companies—in 1582 the Livery Companies were ordered by the City not to "suffer any of ther servants, apprentices, journemen, or children, to repare to goe to annye playes, peices, or enterludes." By the turn of the century, however, it was clear that the opposition of the City government was not essentially on grounds of principle, but rather on the issue of control—and the actions of James in the next reign soon settled that. From this point on, although the City might oppose the development of particular playhouses or endeavour to enforce sabbatarian restrictions, it must have felt that the drama was there to stay.

In this atmosphere, dramatic activity revived again in the halls of the Companies, although not on the earlier scale. In any case private performances there had always been exempt from most restrictions. However, instead of being a regular part of the hall feasts, dramatic performances seem to have been of an essentially occasional nature, intended primarily to honour and entertain guests. These included plays, masques, and such slight pieces as The Invention performed for...Edward Barkham included in this edition. Middleton was one of those most often employed to create these entertainments. In January 1613/14 he wrote the no longer extant Masque of Cupid to honour the Somerset marriage on behalf of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen; this took place at Merchant Taylors' Hall. His appointment as City Chronologer in 1620 meant an increase of such commissions; it is safe to assume that he wrote more than the ten pieces collected in Honourable Entertainments (1621) and the 1622 An Invention. These occasions were not always as successful as their organizers wished; John Chamberlain informs Sir Dudley Carleton in 1616 that "on Saterday the Knights of the Bath were entertained by the Lord Mayor at Drapers Hall with a supper and a play, where some of them were so rude and unruly and caried themselves so insolently divers wayes but specially in putting citizens wives to the squeake, so far foorth that one of the sheriffes brake open a doore upon Sir Edward Sackvile, which gave such occasion of scandal, that they went away without the banket though yt were redy and prepared for them."[14]

XIII. "The Politics of Spectacle"

The preceding analysis of Company attitudes and London politics suggests that it would be pointless to expect direct treatment in the Shows of the views of either the Parliamentary-Puritan opposition or the vast majority of Londoners. The entire proceedings were tightly controlled by the governing body of each Company or by committees appointed by it. Such men, even if at times their attitudes were those of the Parliamentary-Puritan opposition, were not likely to sanction anything with even remotely seditious implications; hence the orthodoxy, the conventionality of which Clark complains. Nonetheless, the sheer magnificence of the display, reaching its zenith in the 1620s and 1630s is itself, however frequently combined with pious protestations of loyalty to the king, an assertion of London's new sense of itself. And with this every Londoner could identify. Both Glynne Wickham and Muriel Bradbrook have pointed out that "in the underlying basis of flattery and inflated self-esteem, in the extravagance of the expenditure, and in the spectacular quality" of both masque and Lord Mayor's Show, we may perceive "a similarly dangerous and aggressive spirit beneath the theatrical cloak." Professor Bradbrook goes further and argues that "As the split between court and city widened, the Lord Mayor's pageants concentrated rather on the history of the city itself than on the glories of a united monarchy." This needs partial qualification. The early pageants are indeed remarkable for the emphasis they place on the sovereign rather than the City; Peele's Descensus Astraeae is more concerned with Elizabeth than William Webbe, the new Lord Mayor. More equably, Munday in The Triumphs of Re-United Britannia (1605) carefully uses the Brutus myth to honour both James, the unifier of the kingdom, and Leonard Holliday, at the same time achieving a previously unknown degree of unity among the various tableaux. However, even at the end of James' reign when, we are told, his popularity had waned from those heady early days, the pageant poets still celebrate at length his virtues as peacemaker and second Brutus. So in 1623, Middleton devotes an entire tableau, based on the Drapers' Company arms to lauding "that Royall Peacemaker, our King" (1. 274). There seems nothing perfunctory in Middleton's and Webster's eulogies of James in the 1620s; however, such praise for the Crown does seem to decrease during Charles' reign. It is perhaps possible to see this process at work in the first Show of the new reign, Middleton's The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity (1626). Certainly, given his earlier work, it is strange not to find Middleton making the most of the accession of a new monarch. Is it straining the evidence too much to interpret his assertion that the City owes to the sovereign "all duties that just service comprehends" and will always be first in any "duty [that] toward good supplies (11. 156, 180; my italics) as a qualification of the absolute loyalty of City to Crown usually expressed in the earlier Shows.

And in Heywood's Shows the relationship between City and sovereign is of almost negligible importance.

Heywood's final Show, Londini Status Pacatus (1639), which includes a tableau contrasting the horrors of "the Calamities of War, & the blessedness of peace" has been singled out by Clark as indicating the reluctance of the pageant poets to admit that "there was or could be a cloud in the sky."143 This is unfair to Heywood; his Show, ironically the last before the Restoration, although setting the ravages of civil war in Germany, must have been intended, and was undoubtedly read, as a comment on the current political situation. And as such, it shows, as Wickham has pointed out, "a degree of common-sense realism entirely lacking among the courtiers responsible for the production of Davenant's Salmacida Spolia in the same year."144

Within this general framework of a gradual inward turning to concentrate on the glories of London, and the significance of this as a political gesture, reference to contemporary events can sometimes be discerned in particular pageants. Sheila Williams, considering The Triumphs of Truth (1613), comments that Truth in the pageant is a religious Truth, in fact, a strongly Protestant one, and suggests that the Show is "a serious interpretation of the political and religious situation in 1613"; the year of the marriage of Princess Elizabeth to the Elector Palatine.145 Sometimes contemporary allusions are obvious; for instance, the relief of the entire nation at Prince Charles' safe, brideless return from Spain in October 1623 is reflected in The Triumphs of Integrity later that month. In others current happenings may have given added meaning to otherwise conventional sentiments. So in The Sunne in Aries (1621) Middleton, as he had frequently done before, deplores bribery in the magistrate; the fall of Bacon in the same year sharpens the point. And in The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity in 1626 the unaccustomed heavy emphasis on Drake's victories may have been intended to recall the Cadiz fiasco of the previous year.

Part of Middleton's work for the City involved compiling accounts of significant events and what we know of the contents of these now lost works assures us of his keen interest in the political climate of the day, including the fall of Bacon. According to Oldys they were entitled I. Annales: or a Continuation of Chronologic; conteyninge Passages and Occurences proper to the Honnorable Cityt of London: Beginninge in the Yeare of our Lorde 1620. By Thomas Midleton then received by their Honnorable Senate as Chronologer for the Cittye. There are in it, these Articles under the year 1621.--On Good Fryday in the Morn died John (King) Lord Bishop of London.--28 May Francis Lord Verulam committed to the Tower. (Seal taken from him the last day of April).--27 December Sir Edward Coke Committed to the Tower.--December The Fortune Play House, situate between White Cross Street and Golding Lane, burnt, &c. II. Middleton's Farrago: In which there is--The Earl of Essex his Charge against Viscount Wimbleton, & the Viscounts Answer.--The Treaty and Articles of Marriage between Prince Charles & Henrietta Maria.--Parliamentary Matters, 1625-26.--Habeas Corpus 1627 &c.146

XIV. Middleton and Civic Pageantry

Middleton's involvement with civic pageantry spans almost his entire dramatic career; he writes plays from 1602-24 and pageants from 1604-26. We first know of him as a playwright in 1602, from Henslowe's diary, when, in conjunction with Dekker, Munday, Drayton, and Webster, he contributed to a lost play called Caesars Fall or Two Shapes.147 Two of these collaborators, Dekker and Munday, were to be important in his pageant career. Although the diary also tells us that Middleton was writing plays on his own at this time, his first undisputed extant play is The Phoenix of 1603-4. Meanwhile his collaboration with Dekker continued: the two produced The Honest Whore I in 1604 and in the same year Dekker presumably co-opted Middleton and generously credited him with the speech of Zeal in the New World Arch of the Coronation Show for James I.

This was Middleton's first venture into civic pageantry; one not repeated until 1613. In the interim he produced the set of comedies of London life which represent the other side of the coin displayed in the mayoral entertainments. In these plays Middleton presents an ironic view of the seamy side of London society, a world where the old ties of kinship and social responsibility have been perverted by the rampant desire for money or sex. Here we find such citizens as Quomodo, the scheming Draper of Michaelmas Term, a far cry from the moral paragons of Middleton's later Shows for that Company. Quomodo exults at the prospect of the wealth to be derived from term time: "you know 'tis term time, and Michaelmas term too, the drapers' harvest for foot-cloths, riding-suits, walking-suits, chamber-gowns, and hall gowns." (I, 254). In the Drapers' Shows, however, their trade is metamorphosed into a symbol of order: "there we shall finde the whole Livery of this most renowned and famous City, as upon this Day, and at all Solemne meetings, furnished by it; it clothes the Honorable Senators in their highest and richest Wearings, all Courts of Justice, Magistrates, and Judges of the Land" (II, 11. 99-104; THP, 11. 55-9). The hostility of Middleton's attitude to the citizenry in this period has led Muriel Bradbrook to speculate that perhaps the Companies "thought him worth buying off." It is more plausible, however, that Middleton, always something of an opportunist, perceived the prospects for a skilful writer of city entertainments and seized upon the entree given to him in 1613. That his attitude to his civic patrons remained at least somewhat ambivalent is suggested by Hengist, King of Kent (c. 1616-20). Here Simon the Mayor and his fellow townsmen prepare, according to the precedent of the Town Book, a "conceit of mickle wight" for Vortigern; he, however, is not impressed by their "tedious and ridiculous duties" (II, 69).
Middleton's first mayoral entertainment, The Triumphs of Truth (1613), was produced, in some sort of association with the more experienced Munday, for Sir Thomas Myddleton. To judge from the fulsome address to Sir Thomas in the opening of the pageant, Middleton may well have owed his employment to the intervention of his namesake. The "collaboration" with Munday, however, was evidently not a happy one. Over the previous fifteen years Munday had acquired an enviable position as an unofficial factotum in the preparation of Lord Mayor's Shows; he is known to have written five between 1602 and 1611 and was likely responsible for some of the missing ones from 1597-1601. The involvement of the writer in all aspects of the pageant—the devising, writing, and organizing the production—is due to him. Middleton appears to have regarded The Triumphs of Truth as an opportunity to supplant Munday. This leads to the slightly ludicrous spectacle of his attacking the artistic limitations of his rival, "the impudent common writer," and lamenting "so glorious a fire in bounty and goodness offering to match itself with freezing Art, sitting in darkness, with the candle out, looking like the picture of Black Monday," but yet being compelled at the end of the text to commend him for the furnishing of apparel and porters (VII, 233-4, 262). As Jean Robertson points out, the dispute between the two strongly suggests that enough was at stake financially to provoke such rivalry. The Grocers' Accounts, however, suggest an additional explanation. Munday is paid for the "devyse of the Pageant and other shewes," for providing porters, and also actors and costumes for all tableaux except the pageant. Middleton is paid for "the ordering overseeing and wryting of the whole Devyse & alsoe for the appareling the personage in the Pageant." The difficulty here lies in the interpretation of terms. Clearly, however, Munday was responsible for the initial devising or invention of the whole scheme, although this basic conception may well have changed during the writing. Such a relationship, as the history of the masque shows well, provides ample ground for quarrels, and if we assume that Middleton was eager for financial and artistic reasons to take over as much of Munday's work as possible, then the friction caused by such an arrangement is not surprising. This would also explain Middleton's insistence on the title-page that the pageant was "Directed, Written, and Redeem'd into Forme, from the Ignorance of some former times, and their Common Writer, By Thomas Middleton" (VII, 229). Such hostility in their first collaborative effort bodes ill for future joint work.

The spectacular effects and general magnificence of The Triumphs of Truth must have pleased the Grocers and ensured serious consideration for any future projects devised by Middleton. This is borne out by his employment in 1614, by the Lord Mayor, Sir Thomas Myddleton, and the Aldermen to write a (no longer extant) masque in honour of the Somerset marriage. Three years later, in 1617, he competes successfully against Munday to write his second mayoral pageant, this time for George Bowles, another Grocer. The strength of Munday's position, however, lay in his versatility. This has generally been attributed to his being a practising draper. Discussions of this are bedevilled by lack of accuracy over what a draper actually was: nonetheless, most concur that he kept a draper's shop. But I have been unable to find any evidence to support this. That he was, as J. H. P. Pafford describes him, "a keeper and apparently a hirer-out of clothing and properties used in pageants" is undeniable, but it is much more likely that he relied on his contacts both in the theatrical world and in the Company to do this effectively.

Munday was indeed to prove hard to supplant. The Ironmongers remained faithful to him in 1618, and he uses the opportunity of that pageant, Sidero-Thriambos or Steele and Iron Triumphing to protest his vilification. However, in the following year Middleton again triumphed and continued the quarrel by sneering in the opening to The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity (his pageant for the Skinner, William Cokayne) at previous triumphs "wherein Art hath been but weakly imitated and most beggarly worded" (VII, 315). The two are again yoked together in The Sunne in Aries in 1621. The Drapers' Bachelors' Accounts make it clear that the Company contracted with Middleton, Christmas, and Munday for all aspects of the pageant (p. 322). Sheila Williams, something of a partisan of Munday's, comments that "the only reason for thinking Munday second to Middleton is that the Drapers' Company bought scarves to be worn for Christmas and Middleton but not for the poor old draper Anthony Munday." However, the evidence of the text suggests strongly that Middleton was solely responsible for its writing even if Munday did have a considerable say in the planning and organization of the Show.

Undoubtedly the employment of Munday by the Drapers in these years owed something to his being a member of the Company as well as to his command over organization. To judge from the situation in 1623 the chances are that the collaboration of 1621 was not particularly happy. This time the Company employed both Middleton and Munday but on an entirely separate basis. Munday prepares the Argoe for the water show, a tableau of Jason, Medea, and the Argonauts with no speeches, and writes a separately published description of it, The Triumphs of the Golden Fleece. It makes no mention of any other tableaux. Middleton writes the pageant proper, but far from crediting Munday with the water show, claims that it consisted of his own Imperial Canopy. It seems probable that the Drapers, wishing to employ Middleton while not neglecting their brother Munday, hit on this as a satisfactory way of eliminating any bad feeling engendered by the previous collaboration.

The period 1613-20 marks Middleton's growing interest in "public" and occasional literature. During this time his output includes, in addition to the mayoral pageants, The New River Entertainment (1613), Civitatis Amor (1616), The Peacemaker (1618), The Inner Temple Masque (1619), and some of the entertainments in Honorable Entertainments (1621). In 1620, during the mayoralty of Cokayne, his aptitude for this sort of work was recognized by his appointment as City Chronologer, his duties being to "collect and set down all memorable acts of this City, and occurrences thereof, and for such other employments as this Court shall have occasion to use him in," for which he was paid £6. 13. 04. The "other employments" included such pieces as those in Honourable Entertainments (1621) and An Invention (1622). These, despite being essentially private entertainments, closely resemble in function and technique the more elaborate, popular Lord Mayor's Show. The more important works, the so-called "Annales" and "Middleton's Farrago," were extant in the eighteenth century. Middleton's performance in this office, unlike that of his successor Ben Jonson, must have been highly satisfactory, for he was given a pay increase in January 1620/21, frequent grants of money, and the occasional nomination of one person to the freedom of the City; in addition his widow received a free gift of money after his death. After this appointment he wrote all but one of the inaugural pageants until his death in 1627, and was in addition employed in partnership with Christmas to produce the abortive Coronation Show for Charles I in 1625-26.

The interest in public affairs displayed by Middleton in these works emerges powerfully in his final play, A Game at Chess (1624). The dramatist here combines his fascination with politics and both the satiric technique of the London comedies and the emblematic technique of the pageants, thus creating the greatest success of the pre-Restoration theatre. Moreover, the play may have more in common with the pageants than political interest and technique. Margot Heinemann points out that Middleton had used the figure of Error to great effect ten years earlier in The Triumphs of Truth; she also suggests that the Spaniard in The Triumphs of Honor and Industry (1617) was an early sketch for the Black Knight. Certainly Busino's account of this Show makes it clear that the Spaniard, although respectable on the page, behaved so ridiculously as to "elicit roars of laughter from the multitude" (CSPV, XV, 62). Middleton, in effect the producer of the Show, must have sanctioned this capitalizing on popular prejudice; it was a technique he was to exploit to the full in A Game at Chess. In that case, too, contemporary accounts of the play remind us of the discrepancy between what actually happened onstage and the text itself. According to John Chamberlain the players "counter-feited his [Gondomar] person to the life, with all his graces and faces, and had gotten (they say) a cast sute of his apparell for the purpose, and his Lytter." ¹⁵⁹

As a result of his interest in contemporary affairs, attempts have been made to define Middleton's political and religious opinions. Margot Heinemann is probably right in seeing him as a moderate Puritan, but her attempt to ally him closely with the Parliamentary-Puritan opposition needs some qualification. First, although some of the dramatist's patrons can be identified as committed Puritans, others such as William Cokayne and Francis Jones were not.¹⁶⁰ Second, she fails to deal with the implications of such works as The Peacemaker (1618) which so closely conformed to royal policy as to be directly encouraged by James I.¹⁶¹ This insistence on the virtues of peace is duplicated in almost all the "public" works written by Middleton, and there is no reason to doubt the genuineness of his praise. It is also necessary to remember that the views expressed in A Game at Chess should not necessarily be taken as a direct expression of Middleton's own. At the very least, Middleton was eminently capable of writing well whatever his patrons or employers wished to have presented.

The importance of this occasional work, especially that done for the City, has generally been underestimated, even ignored, in studies of Middleton.¹⁶² In fact, far from being an isolated aspect of his career, it forms an integral part of it, and an awareness of this is valuable for an understanding of his plays. The interest in allegory and emblem remains constant from The Phoenix (concerned like the pageants with the well-being of the commonwealth) to A Game at Chess. Recognition of the congeniality of this technique is of value even to a study of the city comedies, reducing the tendency to over-emphasize their "photographic realism," and thus eliminating many of the difficulties associated with scenes such as those with Dampit in A Trick to Catch the Old One (1604-5) or Penitent Brothel's repentance in A Mad World, My Masters (1604-5). A Game at Chess then becomes a fitting culmination to both aspects of Middleton's career, the dramatist and the chronologer.

Middleton's contribution to the form of the Lord Mayor's Show lies, as David Bergeron has suggested, in his endeavour to use the techniques of the moral interlude to unify the various tableaux. In his first pageant, The Triumphs of Truth, he experiments with using the dramatic form itself of the moral interlude as the structure of the Show. Man in the person of the Mayor is confronted with the ongoing choice between Truth and Error: if he chooses Error then his destruction will be as assured as that of Error in the Show, for Truth alone can ensure salvation. This experiment, however, can at best be considered a partial success; certainly Middleton abandons it and concentrates instead on using images of light and dark, suggesting the recurrent conflict, to unify otherwise essentially discrete tableaux. All Middleton's Shows are moral allegories; he demonstrates little of Munday's or Dekker's interest in history and none of Heywood's in "hieroglyphs." This parallels the influence of the moral interlude on his plays. It is instructive to compare the treatment of the inevitable Jason tableau in three Shows by different writers for the Drapers' Company, Middleton's The Sunne in Aries (1621), Munday's Metropolis Coronata (1615), and Heywood's Londini Status Pacatus (1639).
In The Sunne in Aries Jason appears as a type of heroic virtue, a precedent for the Lord Mayor on his voyage for the Fleece of Fame. Middleton subordinates everything to the moral allegory, ignoring all other aspects of the myth, and even only mentioning the hero's association with the Company in so far as this makes him peculiarly suited to be the speaker from the Chariot of Honour. Munday and Heywood, while not neglecting Jason the heroic exemplar, are less single-minded. In both, the presence of Jason's associates, Medea and the Argonauts in Metropolis Coronata and Medea alone in Londini Status Pacatus, signifies the community of effort necessary in City government, an essentially co-operative venture rather than the heroic struggle of one man. And both stress the Fleece as the symbol of England's prosperity. Munday's tableau also relies heavily on spectacle: the Argo "is rowed by divers comely Eunuches, which continually attended on Medea, and she favouring them but to passe under the fleece of Golde, had all their garments immediatly sprinkled over with golde, even as if it had showred downe in droppes upon them" (sig. A4). And Heywood, typically, uses his tableau to discourse upon the symbolic and natural value of camels, both Bactrian and Arabian, and sheep.

The literary qualities of Middleton's pageants are not great, but it must be remembered that the form of the pageant required little more than the ability to express appropriate sentiments in acceptable, dignified verse. The Shows were not designed to provide showcases for the writer's literary talents. Remembering this, the censure heaped upon Middleton and the other pageant poets is not generally deserved. Writing of Munday's Chrusothriambos (1611), J. H. P. Pafford argues that the style is "rather heavy and stilted, particularly in the verse, but there is no doubt that this was conventional. Some of the speeches are from ghosts of the long-departed, and an antique form of speech is in character. But it is the speech used for choruses and sometimes by apparitions in Shakespeare and this style was almost certainly an established convention for the pageants. Hence, while there is nothing in Chruso-thriambos to justify the claim that Munday was a poet of excellent merit, it must be noted that such poetry would not be expected in a pageant." 166 This applies to Middleton too, a poet of rather greater merit than Munday. Certainly, the choruses and songs of Hengist, King of Kent (1616-20) are in essentially the same style as the pageants.

Middleton wrote in all seven mayoral entertainments, one for the Skinners' Company, and three each for the Grocers' Company and the Drapers' Company. Two of these three for the Drapers are typical of Middleton's mayoral pageants. By 1621 he has eschewed almost all elements of the dramatic; each tableau is peopled with a different set of figures, none of whom has any dramatic relationship to the others, apart from their presence on the same scaffold. There is no dialogue, only an expository, hortatory speech by the most appropriate of the figures. The unity of the tableaux is entirely thematic and symbolic, and is most effectively achieved in The Sunne in Aries where Middleton uses the manifold implications of the image of the sun to draw the different elements of the pageant together. The Drapers would, I think, have felt that they got good value for money with both this Show and the rather more spectacular Triumphs of Integrity in 1623, but the pageant for 1626, The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity, is a different case. The Drapers withheld money from various employees, but principally Middleton and Christmas, on account of its "ill performance." This is dealt with fully in the introduction to the pageant, but there are certainly good grounds for concluding that Middleton had become rather tired of writing such shows by the end of his career. Nevertheless, I can see little ground for the charge of peculation that R. C. Bald brings against the two.167

Middleton's mayoral pageants appear in the "modernized" Victorian editions of Alexander Dyce and A. H. Bullen of the dramatist's works. The latter also contains the 1622 An Invention...for Edward Barkham. Their texts, however, are neither reliable nor fully annotated. It therefore seemed worthwhile to take one of the two main groups of Middleton's pageants and, using Company records, produce a critical, old-spelling edition. The kindness of the Drapers' Company in allowing me the run of its archives determined my choice of the pageants written for them. This choice proved fortunate in two other respects. First, the Company's records for the period of the development of the Midsummer Watch, the predecessor of the Lord Mayor's Show, are unusually full, thus providing the opportunity to study the early flourishing of civic pageantry. Second, the number of Lord Mayors drawn from the Drapers' Company during the peak period of the Shows, eight between 1614 and 1639, has allowed me to compare the ways in which Middleton on the one hand, and Munday and Heywood, on the other, tackle writing Shows for the Company.
NOTES

1 Dekker, Britannias Honor in Dramatic Works, IV, ed. Fredson Bowers (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1961), 82. All quotations from Dekker's dramatic works will be from this edition.

2 Quoted in Sheila Williams, "The Lord Mayor's Show from Peele to Settle," Diss. London Univ., 1957, p.50.

3 "Pageant" originally referred to the scaffold itself, whether fixed or not, and later came to signify the representation on that scaffold. The term finally comes to include the entire entertainment. Company records generally refer to the principal tableau as the "pageant," the others being subsidiary "shows." It should always be clear from the context which sense is intended here.

6 Of the three LMSs included in this edition, The Triumphs of Integrity (hereafter TI) provides the fullest account of the procession's route; I have accordingly used it to flesh out the day's events. For this purpose I have ignored the problems raised by Munday's The Triumphs of the Golden Fleece (London, 1623) in relation to TI, see pp. 174-6 for a discussion of this.

10 Drapers' Co. Warden's Accounts, 1475-1509, +403, 77a; MSC III, p.1. The accuracy of the "xiiij" is considered in MSC III, p.xix.

11 S. Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p.18.
Glynne Wickham, Early English Stages, II,i (London: Routledge, 1963), 325-6 (hereafter EES), considers whether the Midsummer pageants might not be "survivors of a London guild cycle or cycles." Unfortunately, the evidence is too scanty to admit of any conclusions. The tableaux can, however, all be paralleled in the better documented Royal Entry.

Calendar of State Papers Venetian, 1520-26 (London, 1869), III, 136-7 (hereafter CSPV). This description raises interesting questions about the political nature of the tableaux. The ed. of CSPV suggests that "the tumbling girl, Salome, may have played a more prominent part than usual...to remind Londoners of her mother, Herodias, 'for John had said unto Herod, it is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife.'" Certainly, it was just at this time that Henry VIII's initial qualms about his marriage became public; all other dramatic representations of John the Baptist that I know of deal with his preaching in the wilderness rather than his execution. There is also the possibility of an allusion to the siege of Belgrade, although Sydney Anglo, Spectacle, Pageantry and Early Tudor Policy (Oxford: Clarendon, 1969), p.177, disputes this on the grounds that tableaux such as this castle are too common in the Shows for any specific meaning to be intended. The pageants of St. George and St. John the Baptist were probably provided by the Skinners and the Merchant Taylors respectively for the Sheriffs.

The pageant never actually took place, but it is frequently cited as the first e.g. of classical symbolism in a trade pageant. This honour may, however, belong to the Achilles who featured in the 1512 Show for Sir Roger Achilly. This depends on whether he was the Greek hero or an obscure king of Iceland, see F.P. Wilson, ed., A Calendar of the Dramatic Records in the Books of the London Clothworkers' Company, Malone Soc. Collections, V (Oxford: Malone Soc., 1959), p.4 n.2.

Drapers' Co. Repertories 7, 642, 13 June; MSC III, p.32.

According to Wriothesley "the watche kept in London at Midsummer was put downe by the kings commaundement because the citizens had bene at great charge in their muster; howebeyt the mayor and sherifffes had prepared divers pageantes with lightes and other thinges for to have had the said watche, and had no knowledge till two dayes afore Midsummer that it should not be kept, which was a great losse to poore men" (Withington, I, 42). Monarchs were frequently hostile to the expenditure of the Companies on festivities, especially if they were reluctant to pay Crown levies and dues.

19 Drapers' Rep. 7, 468-9; MSC III, p.21.

20 The plays on the Virgin in the York Cycle were excised in 1548, see H.C. Gardiner, Mysteries End (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1946), p.61.

21 Gardiner, pp.80-85.

22 Britannias Honor, Bowers IV, 83.

23 Withington I, 124.

27 Printed in MSC III, pp.42-3; the eds. suggest that Richard Mulcaster may have been responsible for them. It should be noted that Mulcaster was particularly interested in drama, developing it as part of the curriculum of Merchant Taylors' School. This school sometimes provided the children for the early Shows.

28 Wickham, EES, II,240.

30 The most recent study of civic pageantry, David Bergeron's English Civic Pageantry (London: Arnold, 1971), uses their dramatic qualities (plot, character conflict, dialogue, etc.) to judge their excellence; see also Wickham, EES, I, 51-111, II, 206-44.

31 Ben Jonson, ed. C.H. Herford and Percy and Evelyn Simpson, III, (Oxford: Clarendon, 1927), 107; all quotations from Jonson will be from this edition, cited as H&S.

32 See p.226.

33 The Jonsonian Masque, passim.

34 The Jonsonian Masque, pp.32-34.

Bergeron, Civic Pageantry, pp.177, 164 (Dekker) and pp.179, 200 (Middleton). "Soul" is used in both pageant and masque to refer to the poetic and allegorical elements. The "body" was the contribution of the artificer.

"Middleton's Civic Employments," Modern Philology, 31 (1933), 75.

CSPV, 1617-19, XV, 60-61. The contrast between ideal and actual behaviour was sometimes apparent at masques too, see the Harington account of the disorders at the entertainment for the King of Denmark at Theobalds, E.K. Chambers, The Elizabethan Stage, 2nd ed. (1923; rpt. Oxford: Clarendon, 1951), I, 172.

John Aubrey, quoted in MSC III, p.xlii.

The focussing of the mayoral shows on a VIP who is both spectator and participant provides another parallel with the masque.

Jo. Cooke, Greenes Tu Quoque (London, 1614), sig, C2.

H&S, VII, 91.

He was satirized in The Case is Altered, Histrio-mastix, and Kind Hearts Dream. Middleton attacks him in his 1613 and 1619 Shows and Dekker's 1612 criticism of earlier Shows is perhaps directed at him.

S. Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p.28.

MSC III, pp.127, 129.

Heywood, Porta Pietatis (London, 1638), sig. B3v.
50. H&S, VII, 735. I doubt if Jonson would appreciate having his analysis of the purpose of the masque transferred to pageantry; certainly in his part of James' Coronation Show he was concerned to differentiate between his own creation and mere pageantry (VII, 104). Nevertheless, if we substitute the Lord Mayor for Jonson's great princes, his remarks are equally valid for the LMS.

53. Kernodle, p.62; for Revels Office payments for the construction of chariots, see Wickham, EES, II, 296.

57. Kernodle, p.73.

58. Wickham, EES, II, i, 217, suggests that this is true of Middleton's use of the fountain in The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity (hereafter THP). In this case, however, Middleton's lack of interest extends to the entire pageant.

59. See Wickham, EES, II, i, 221 for the genesis of curtains.

60. Wickham, EES, I, 93-7, II, 225-6.

61. In addition, various parts of the physical structure of the pageants were sometimes kept by either Company or artificer (see pp.54,93); their concern for valuable property may be another practical reason for the continued use of processional staging. Certainly, we know from Middleton's The Black Book (1604) what could happen to anything portable on civic occasions. He describes Pierce Penyless' coverlet as "made of pieces a' black cloth clapt together, such as was snatched off the rails in King's-street at the queen's funeral (VIII, 25).
E.g. in 1613, 1622, 1629, and 1635; see MSC III under these years. Unfortunately, none of these references indicates how many were hired.

Chrysanaleia, ed. J.G. Nichols (London, 1844)

Chrysanaleia, p.12.

S. Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p.70.

EES, II, 228. It seems clear from Wickham's notes to the illustration of the artificial animals from the Alsloot painting of the Archduchess Isabella's entry into Brussels, EES, I, 395, that he bases this assertion on inferences from this painting and a reference to a tournament chariot "drawyn wt foure m(a)rvellous bests...ev(er)y oon havyng wt in them two men" II, 224). However, it seems more likely to me that the massive animals in the Alsloot painting concealed wheels not men; furthermore, concealing the manpower within animals would be more practicable for a tournament or indoor entertainment than a procession covering several miles.

Civic Pageantry, p.165.

We know that horses in tournaments were sometimes allegorically decked. Nashe in The Unfortunate Traveller, describes the elaborate trappings of Surrey's horse, designed to resemble an ostrich, Works, ed. R.B. McKerrow, II (Oxford; Blackwell, 1958), 272-3.

Webster, Complete Works, ed. F.L. Lucas (London: Chatto, 1927), III, 321. All quotations from Webster will be to this edition.

"Rapports du Poète et de l'Artiste dans la Préparation des Cortèges du Lord Maire (Londres 1553-1640)" in Fêtes de la Renaissance, I, 275.

See MSC III entries for these years.

Campbell (London, 1609), sig. B2v-B3; because of these problems the speeches were delivered by St. George and St. Andrew, "men of action and audible voices."

MSC III, pp.87,108,115,123.

The Court of Assistants, which included the Master and Wardens of the Company, was drawn from senior members of the Livery or Clothing. The Company's junior organization, the Bachelors or Yeomanry, was governed by four wardens, subject to the authority of the Court of Assistants.

For instance, in 1635 two parties bid for the production of the pageant: Robert Norman and John Taylor proposed five tableaux for £190 and John Christmas and Thomas Heywood offered five for £180. The Ironmongers accepted the latter bid, see MSC III, pp.122-123.

The Merchant Taylors and the Haberdashers covered all their costs in this way, MSC III, p.xxix.

The Livery of the Skinners' Co. generally contributed about 2/7 of the cost, MSC III, p.xxx.

Rep. +131, 105a.

See p.332 and MSC III, p.xxx.

S. Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p.54.

Occasionally the preparations began in June or July, but September, or even early October, was more common. The Drapers began preparations for the 1621 Show on 19 Sept.

S. Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p.61. When the Wardens Bachelors had served their term they were admitted to the Livery.

The ostrich from 1629 is still at Ironmongers' Hall. The ship from the Grocers' 1613 Show, for instance, was retrimmed for the 1617 Show.

E.g. 1566, 1616, 1618; see MSC III entries for these years.

The best discussion of this is Robertson's "Les Rapports," pp. 264-78. Much of the credit for the rise of the writer must be given to Munday; in contrast to Ben Jonson, who merely wrote the speeches, he was a veritable factotum. The characterization of the writer as producer is drawn from Wickham, EES, II, 242. I am not sure, however, that his contention that the poet was paid more than the artificer is correct. The contracting to them in tandem, especially in the 1620s, makes it hard to be certain.

This trend continues and by 1708 speeches are abandoned altogether.

Wickham, EES, II,i,242.

In 1621 the Drapers bought "27 pownds weight of cheese...7 dozen of bread...a barrell of beere...and...pottes to drinke in...which was provided to make all the blewe gowne men dyne in the Cellor to keepe them within the hall untill the Companyes goinge to Paules" (p.324).

Whifflers were originally marshalls armed with staves or javelins to keep the crowds off. In theory, the staves were purely decorative by the 1620s.

Uffington was a tenant of the Company and Snowden was one of the Bachelors in foynes in 1621. In 1540 the Court of Assistants ordered that "the Company shall at all assemblies preferne such as be brothren of this felyschip afore a straunger in all maner of thyngs, for the wyche else they schall dysburse any money, be yt for wares, workmanschepe, vytaylls, or any other thyngs necessarie, provided always that they may be served as well and as good chepe of our said brothren as of a straunger" (Johnson, II, 76;from Rep. 7, 469). It is reasonable to suppose that this policy was still adhered to in the 17th century.

Johnson, III, 10, n.3, claims that Middleton was a Draper. This was scotched by Bald who points out that the Thomas Middleton in the Freedom List was the son of Richard Middleton, not the William Middleton who was the dramatist's father, "Middleton's Civic Employments," p.73 n.24. The title page of the British Library copy of Dekker's Troia-Nova Triumphans has "marchant taylor" added in an early hand. The lack of supporting evidence makes this doubtful.

Fairholt, p.ii.

Clark, in Theatre Miscellany, p.3.

Margot Heinemann, "Middleton's A Game at Chess: Parliamentary-Puritans and Opposition Drama," English Literary Renaissance, 5 (1975), 233-35, 247-9. She cites William Hammond, dedicatee of the Malone MS of A Game at Chess, and Sir Thomas Myddleton who she claims must have been a business associate of the Earl of Pembroke, the likely patron of the play.

The Recorder and the Remembrancer were generally royal nominees. Johnson, the historian of the Drapers is atypical in the consideration he gives to political and social history. The best accounts of City politics before 1642 are Valerie Pearl, London and the Outbreak of the Puritan
This is a flaw in Heinemann's argument; she tends to assume that political and religious opinions were more stable in the 1620s than they in fact were. I am not sure that it is safe to assume that because Sir Thomas Myddleton was a "strong Puritan" (p.233) he was automatically a member of the "Parliamentary-Puritan opposition."

Pearl. p.60.

Clark, in Theatre Miscellany, p.4.

Mun, Englands Treasure by Forraign Trade, quoted in Tawney, p.77.

Cf, for instance, William Cokayne (Lord Mayor 1619-20) who married his daughter to Baron Howard of Effingham, and Sebastian Harvey (Lord Mayor 1618-19) who, despite threats and cajoleries on the part of James, refused to marry his daughter to Buckingham's feckless brother Kit Villiers. Other Lord Mayors with close Court connections included John Swinnerton (1612-13) and Francis Jones (1620-21), both Customs Farmers.

Tawney, p.284. Cranfield is a good example of the complexity of London politics; his sharp business practices and Court connections made him many enemies among the aldermanic Bench, but he was no friend to the Cokayne party either, and may indeed have been responsible for James' abandonment of him. R.C. Bald in his edition of A Game at Chess (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1929), p.11, identifies the White King's Pawn as Cranfield.

Quoted in D.A. Williams, p.3.

Corporation of London Record Office (hereafter CLRO) Rep. 36, 205v, quoted in D.A. Williams, p.5; St. Antholin's was the most fashionable Puritan church. Its lectures later formed the basis for the operations of the Feofees for Impropritions.

Johnson, III, 70-72.

So in 1627 we find Barkham, Lumley, Cotton, Hacket, Ranye, Abbot, and Garway among the Drapers willing to lend money to Charles, Johnson, III, 119 n.3.
Clarendon (quoted in Pearl, p.71) commented after the Restoration that "the City of London was (by the court) looked upon too much of late time as a Common Stock not easily to be exhausted, and as a body not to be grieved by ordinary acts of injustice." This is precisely what the Black Knight claims to have achieved in A Game at Chess: "The court hath held the city by the horns / Whilst I have milk'd her" (VII, 65).

One source of resentment was James' lotteries. On occasion the prizes were trivial or even non-existent. William Herbert, The History of the Twelve Great Livery Companies of London (London, 1837), I, 154, records this amusing annotation from the Merchants Taylors Books, 1612: "One byrde in the hand is worth two in the wood, / If we get the great lot it will do us [no] good."

The first issue arose in the 1570s and involved a dispute between Crown and Companies over the amount of rent charges fixed for lands previously devoted to "superstitious" uses. It was not settled until 1623 when subjects were protected against accusations of concealment by Act of Parliament. Johnson, II, 208, was not able to find any trace of concealment by the Drapers, although they were accused of so doing. In 1609-10 James persuaded the Companies to settle Ulster; in 1625 Charles I attempted unsuccessfully to sequester the lands, but in 1638, as a result of Wentworth's Irish policy, the Companies were forced to surrender their holdings by order of the Star Chamber.

The difficulty of categorizing political and religious opinions is apparent here. Abbot, the brother of Archbishop Abbot, had earlier opposed government fiscal policy, refusing to pay the tax on ccurrants in 1628, but by 1637 (perhaps as a result of jobbery--he had been charged with remissness in fitting out the City's quota of ships and this charge was dropped in 1637) he was clearly a supporter of the King's. Similarly, Garway was at first reluctant to enforce the collection of the 1639/40 loan.

Johnson, III, 1414. There is not direct evidence for this, but, given the increasing tension and Abbot's political change of heart, it is not impossible. Garway's Londini Status Pacatus was the last pageant before the Interregnum, the era of love, peace, and abundance being clearly over.
Johnson, III, 95. The Company's diversification away from the cloth trade is indicated by its lack of interest in any of the ramifications of the Cokayne project.

Johnson IV, 96-102 analyses the trades and occupations of members of the Company.

Quoted in Johnson, II, 236.

Johnson III, 87-88, 191-93; the following figures are all from this source.

Heinemann, pp.249-50.

Lusher, "Guild Drama," p.158. The companies included the King's Players, the Prince's, the Duke of Norfolk's, the Duke of Suffolk's, John Slye's, John English's, Thomas Yely's, David Sothurne's, Hinstok's, and Killingworth's. At times the personnel of these companies seems to have overlapped.

The reign of Edward VI marks the beginning of the Court of Aldermen's attempts to inhibit plays and players. In 1549 they appointed two Secondaries of the Compters to "peruse" plays (Chambers, I, 275).

Quoted in Wickham, II, 84.

Wickham, EES, II, i, 237 and Bradbrook, The Living Monument, p.78; at the same time there is an element of the City aping the Court's magnificence.

Clark, in Theatre Miscellany, p.3.

EES, II, 238.

Diary, pp.201,202.
Bradbrook, The Living Monument, p.94.

Pearl, p.9, refers to Munday as the official City Chronologer, but I have found no evidence that he ever occupied the position. He did, however, undertake a considerable amount of work either directly or indirectly on behalf of the City from at least 1580 on.

MSC III, p.87. It is interesting to note that even in such a unified show as The Triumphs of Truth (hereafter TT), the Grocers see the whole in the old way as a pageant (i.e. the principal tableau, in this case the Mount Triumphant) and subsidiary tableaux.

The Company Quarterage Books (+259, 168, +261, 163) refer to him only as a poet and, in fact, given the increasing involvement of Drapers in trades other than drapery, the likelihood is small. In addition, although Munday was a Draper by patrimony, his father Christopher was one of those members who were in fact stationers, and apprenticed his son to John Alde, the printer, see Mark Eccles, "Anthony Munday," in Studies in the English Renaissance Drama, ed. Josephine W. Bennett (New York: New York Univ. Press), p.97.

"The LMS from Peele to Settle," p.142.

Bald, p.67, but see Dyce I, xix-xxvii for full details.

The Coronation show was first delayed because of the plague and then abandoned at the King's insistence.

Heinemann, p.255 n.11.

Chamberlain, II, 578.

Heinemann, pp.247-8, identifies as important patrons of Middleton's the Puritans, Myddleton; William Hammond, dedicatee of the Malone MS of A Game at Chess; and Richard Fishborne and John Browne, dedicatees of The Marriage of the Old and New Testament (1620). Yet Cokayne, perhaps impressed by the judicious praise meted out to him in The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity (1619); hereafter TLA was ultimately responsible for appointing Middleton as City Chronologer, an important and lucrative post. And he did not belong to the Parliamentary-Puritan opposition.

One of the most recent, David Holmes, The Art of Thomas Middleton (Oxford: Clarendon, 1970) barely mentions the City work (and then in passing, in an appendix), let alone taking it into account in interpreting the dramatist's achievement.

T.S. Eliot, Elizabethan Essays (London: Faber, 1934), p.99; this "realism" has become a commonplace in Middleton criticism.

Bergeron, Civic Pageantry, p.200.

S. Williams, "Two Semi-Dramatic Allegories," p.213, notes the "curious ambiguity" between worldly and spiritual values that this gives rise to.

Pafford, Chruso-thriambos, p.16.

"Middleton's Civic Employments," p.76.
EDITORIAL PROCEDURES

The procedure followed is a modified version of the Clarendon Press edition of The Works of Thomas Middleton, eds. J. H. Kaplan and G. B. Shand (7 vols., in progress). The Crane MS of An Invention has been treated more conservatively and the procedure followed for it is outlined in the textual introduction to the entertainment.

Text

1. The spelling is that of the copy-text apart from the substitution of modern forms for s; i, j; u, v; vv for w has been silently reproduced as w.

2. Digraphs in Q have been indicated in the text by ↖, e.g. ægle. Their wide use is characteristic of Middleton.

3. The punctuation is that of the copy-text, altered only when clearly mistaken, or seriously misleading to a reader familiar with Jacobean usage. All changes have been noted in the apparatus.

4. The copy-text's use of the query for exclamatory sentences in the form of a question has been retained.

5. The use of the apostrophe follows the copy-text even where placement does not correspond to a missing letter, e.g. ha's, e'm, do's. This usage is a common Middleton form.
6. The copy-text's use of opening quotation marks to indicate sententiae has been followed.

7. All dashes have been normalized to --.

8. The spacing of words, lines, and sections of the text has been normalized.

9. Abbreviated forms using the tilde and superscript contractions have been expanded silently. The common abbreviations of & Mr., St. (for both street and Saint) have been retained. Other abbreviated forms such as L. for Lord have also been silently expanded.

10. The capitalization is that of the copy-text.

11. No attempt has been made to note or reproduce the appearance of ornamental initials or other letters, display or swash capitals, swash letters, ligatures, wrong-fount type, broken type or turned letters that do not give the appearance of a new word. Capital letters immediately following display or ornamental capitals have been silently reduced to lower case.

12. Italics: the verse speeches, which are printed in italic in the copy-text, have been reproduced in roman in order to avoid long underlined passages in the typescript. Words printed in roman in these sections of the copy-text have correspondingly been changed to italic; however, the initial roman capital of the verse speeches has been retained. These changes have been noted in the list of emended accidentals. Otherwise the copy-text's use of italics has been retained.

13. Marginal notes and braces in the copy-text have been retained. Rules have been omitted.

14. Prose passages in the text have been indented in conformity with the copy-text.

15. Catchwords are not given in the text but non-matching catchwords have been included in the list of emended accidentals.

16. Line numbers (for every five lines) have been supplied in the right-hand margin, commencing with the first line of the dedication and including the head title and headings to speeches. The lineation of these follows the copy-text.

17. Signatures have been supplied in the left-hand margin; a vertical line is used to mark the precise beginning of a page.

Textual Apparatus

Each entertainment is accompanied by:
1. A textual introduction discussing the text and its copy, printing-house procedures, and any bibliographical problems arising from this.

2. A list of substantive changes and refusals to emend. Emendations by earlier editors are included where they present a serious alternative or establish an accepted reading. Alterations made merely to regularize Middleton's verse or make the orthography conform to modern usage are not recorded.

3. A textual commentary discussing substantive changes, refusals to emend, textual cruces, etc.

5. A list of emended accidentals.
THE SUNNE
in Aries.

A NOBLE
SOLEMNITY PERformed through the Citie, at the sole cost and charges of the Honourable and ancient Fraternity of Drapers, at the confirmation and establishment of their most Worthy Brother
the Right Honourable, EDWARD BARKHAM, in the high Office of his Maiesties Lieutenant, the Lord Maior of the famous Citie of LONDON.

Taking beginning at his Lordships going, and perfecting it selve after his return from receiving the Oath of Maiorality at Westminster, on the morrow after SIMON and IVDES day, being the 29. of October. 1621.

AT LONDON:
Printed by Ed. Allde, for H.G. 1621.
THE SUNNE
in Aries.

A NOBLE
SOLEMNITY PERformed through the Citie, at the sole cost and charges of the Honourable and ancient Fraternity of DRAPERS, at the confirmation and establishment of their most Worthy Brother
the Right Honourable, EDWARD BARHAM,
in the high Office of his Maiesties Lieutegante, the Lord Mayor of the famous
CITY of LONDON.

Taking beginning at his Lordships
going, and perfecting itselfe after his returne
from receiving the Oath of Maiorality at WEST-MINSTER, on the morrow after SIMON LYDIES day, being the 29, of October, 1621.

By Tho. MIDDLETON, Gent.

AT LONDON:
Printed by Ed. All de, for H. C. 1621.

Figure 10. Huntington Library copy.
Critical Introduction

The Sunne in Aries celebrated the inauguration of Edward Barkham in "the high Office of his Majesties Lievtenant, the Lord Maior of the famous Citie of London." In his capacity as Alderman, Barkham was already one of Middleton's patrons (he is one of the dedicatees of Honourable Entertainments) and the dramatist was to write An Invention for a feast of his some months later. Nonetheless, there is no indication of a close relationship between the two men.¹

Barkham was a younger son of a good Norfolk family and followed a successful career of law and trade in London.² He was admitted to Gray's Inn in February 1607/8 and became Alderman of Faringdon Within in 1610; from 1621 until his death in 1634 he was, according to his prerogative, Alderman of Cheap. He served as Sheriff in 1611-12, as Lord Mayor in 1621-22, and was knighted while in office in June 1622. He was originally a member of the Leathersellers' Company and its Master from 1605-6 and again from 1608-9. However, City custom demanded that the Lord Mayor belong to one of the twelve great Companies, and it was therefore necessary that Barkham be translated from the Leathersellers, a minor Company, in preparation for his term of mayoralty. He joined the Drapers in July 1621, and was Master of the Company in 1622-23. Like most other members of the City oligarchy, Barkham was primarily a rich merchant with large-scale commercial and financial interests in overseas trade; he was an important member of the Levant Company. His son acquired a baronetcy in 1623, and Barkham himself became a substantial benefactor to his adopted Company.

Unlike some Lord Mayors of the period, Barkham, despite his trading interests, does not seem to have had particularly close connections with the Court. His political and religious beliefs were at least moderately Puritan, for during his mayoralty, as throughout the 1620s, the City government "openly supported activities which smacked strongly of Puritanism, notwithstanding the fact that the City was subject to continual pressure from two high places, the Privy Council and the Bishop of London." It was during his term of office that the City government started financing the St. Antholin's lectures.

Barkham's choosing to translate to the Drapers' Company did not immediately delight its members and they were very reluctant to accept him. The prime reason for this hostility was the unwillingness of Court of Assistants, Livery, and Bachelors to incur the expense of celebrating his assumption of office. In addition, however, the Company felt itself particularly hard done by because it considered that Barkham, as part of a financial arrangement concerning his house in Dowgate which he rented from it, had promised to choose one of the other Companies. The Drapers therefore spent some six weeks attempting to refuse him before the translation finally took place in mid-July. At one meeting of the Company it was requested that all those who wanted Barkham "to be received into this companie shulde holde upp theire handes, noe one hande was helde upp for him," but when they were asked to vote against him, then "every man helde upp his hande" (p.317). The Court of Assistants of the Company accordingly endeavoured to explain to both Barkham and the Court of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen that an investigation had shown the state of "the yeomandry to be very weake & the nomber fewe, the Chardge greate to the Companie of the yeomandry if Mr Alderman Barkeham be of our companie, & the stocke of the yeomandry as nothingle in respecte thereof. Consideringe alsoe the greate chardge this Companie was Latelie putt to by the Maioraltie of Sir Thomas Hayes & Sir John Jolles knightes late Maiors of this cittie nowe deceased & the chardge shortlie to be expected when Mr Alderman Lumley & Mr Alderman Cotten maie come to the office of Maioraltie..." (p.313). Neither Barkham nor the Court of Aldermen was apparently much impressed. Barkham continued to insist that "he woulde never be Lord Maior of London 'unless he weare a Draper" (p.315), and, finally, after considerable wrangling and the intervention of the Privy Council the Drapers were obliged to acquiesce. Even so, they still hoped to free themselves of complete responsibility for the charges of the triumph:

Whereas this Companie by authoritie of the Lordes of his Majesties moste honorable privie Councell weare compelled for the receavinge of Mr. Alderman Barkeham into this Companie Yet the said Lordes for the matter of chardge touchinge the triumphes expected lefte the Companie to themselves not requiringe anie performance thereof at theire handes It is ordered that the Master and wardens nowe to be chosen for the yeare ensewinge together with the nowe present fowre Master wardens and with Mr. Cartwrighte shall repaire to the Courte of Lord Maior and Aldermen and move.them to take suche good course for this Companies ease or fredome of the matter of chardge expected as aforesaid whereby this cittie maie not be disgraced nor this Companie occasioned to complaine elles where as they without precedent have byn Complayned of/ (p.319)

In the end, however, the Company seems to have found all the money itself. Andalthough it was ultimately fairly generous, the events lend some unintentional irony to Middleton's panegyric on the love that the Company has by the pageant shown to the new Lord Mayor: "Their Love is showne / With a Content past Expectation:/ A Care that ha's beene comely, and a Cost / That ha's beene Decent; cheerefull..." (11. 277-280).

The total cost of the day's triumphs amounted to something over £600. The bulk of the money was raised from the Yeomanry in the usual ways: by elevating twelve Bachelors to the Livery, by appointing others to serve in foynes or budge at the appropriate rate, and by fines for exemption from service. The Wardens of the Bachelors received £564. 06. 08 from these sources and paid out £548. 04. 00. Their Accounts break down the receipts as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Item</th>
<th>Amount</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>of Master wardens</td>
<td>300. 00. 00</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of Rowland Griffèth for his fyne</td>
<td>013. 06. 08</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of the Batchelers that fyned</td>
<td>143. 18. 00</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of those as served in foynes</td>
<td>075. 02. 00</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of those as served in Budge</td>
<td>032. 00. 00</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total Received</td>
<td>564. 06. 08</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(p.322)

The additional cost represents the customary payment to the Lord Mayor of 100 marks (£66. 13. 04) for improving his house. The actual payment is recorded in the Wardens' Accounts: "Item paid to Edward Barkham Lord Mayor by order of a Court of Assistants for the paintinge & bewtifyinge of his howse against his Mayorolty Lxvi.li xiix.s iiij.d" (p.320). This item brings the total cost of the celebration to £614.04.01. In comparison Munday's Himatia-Poleos (1614) cost £685. 04. 01 and Middleton's other Drapers' Company pageants £707. 18. 10. (Triumphs of Integrity) and £545. 13. 08 (Triumphs of Health and Prosperity).

Company preparations for the triumph began in mid-September. A minute of the Court of Assistants, dated 19 September 1621, which has not previously been noticed by students of Lord Mayors' Shows, reveals that the Drapers followed the common practice of other Companies by setting up a committee to accept tenders for the pageant. This committee made its choice and then delegated responsibility for overseeing the making of the tableaux and the organizing of the procession to another committee headed by the Wardens of the Bachelors:

Consideracion of the plotts and devyses for the Lord Maior Showes referred/ Item this daie the righte worshippfull the Master and wardens with Mr Raine & Mr Abbott are entrede and ap-pointed by this Courte to take viewe and consideracion of suche plotts and thinges as are offered to be presented to this Companie by severall persons touchinge the pageants and showes intended to be performed by this Companie the daie as Mr Alderman Barkham is to be sworne to the place of Maioraltie and to report to this Courte of theire doings touching the same (p.320)

Presumably the committee found the "plott," "devyse," or "thing" submitted by Middleton and his partners to be the most acceptable. The date of the minute makes it clear that all parties must have worked with great speed. This is confirmed by a payment in the Wardens of the Bachelors' Accounts: "Item paid to Mr Walrond the Marshall to paise a poore man for watching the Pageantes 7 daies iij\textsuperscript{s} vj\textsuperscript{d}," suggesting that work was largely complete one week before the date of performance, October 29. This would mean that Middleton and his associates had less than four weeks to turn their "plott" into a completed pageant. The concerted activity by all involved is also reflected in this entry: "Item spent by ourselves at divers dinners & meetinges whilst wee sate and weare daylie ymployed in the busines xijvi xvj."

Undoubtedly, the organization of the triumph must have required most of the Wardens' attention for the month or so beforehand.

The same Accounts show that Middleton, Garrett Christmas, and Anthony Munday contracted with the Company for the pageant. They were paid £140 for the "makinge and settinge out of the Pageantes and showes viz the one in forme or likenes of a Mountaine one other of a fountaine with a triple Crowne a third called the tower of vertue or the brazen tower and the fowrth a Chariott drawne with twoe pellited lyons and for all Chardges incident to those shewes" (p.322). This payment should be compared to Middleton and Christmas' receipt of £150 for The Triumphs of Integrity and £125 for The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity. The extent of Munday's involvement must, on such scant evidence, remain uncertain. Bentley lists The Sunne in Aries as being by Middleton "with Anthony Munday?"; however, there is, no need to go as far as this. The evidence of the printed text (pace Sheila Williams) is sufficient for us to credit Middleton with its writing. Munday most likely participated in the initial discussions between the partners, and so may have been partly responsible for its "devyse"; he may also have been involved in the costuming, decorating, etc.

The records for all three of these Drapers' Shows demonstrate that writer and artificer were responsible for most details of production of the pageant, for "all Chardges incident to those shewes." The items in the Accounts thus refer primarily to the procession for which the Company itself was responsible. However, from the Wardens Bachelors' Accounts for Barkham's triumph we learn that the pageant structures were built in a barn in Whitecross St. (perhaps the same as that used by Munday in 1623), rather than the traditional place of the Leadenhall. The workmen were supervised by Christmas who would presumably have been responsible for designing the tableaux and attending to the more complex painting and carving. We do not know how many workmen were commonly employed; the Drapers generally reward them with 5/- for drink. Study of the Accounts for 1621, 1623, and 1626 suggests that the basic minimum reward for any service was 1/-, and this would indicate a maximum of five men. Payment for scarves to Middleton for Christmas (but not Munday) implies that both were expected to participate in the procession. Neither of the two entries relating to "the Children of the Pageant" (providing their breakfast and recompensing those who had to look after them for their "trouble") identifies them. In contrast to the records of some other Companies, there is no indication that any adults were involved, so it is possible that some or all of the speaking roles may have been taken by the children.

Other entries in the Bachelors' Accounts for this year remind us of the means used to organize the procession: swordsmen, beadles, marshalls, and greenmen with fireworks. Also participating were thirty-two trumpeters and an assortment of other musicians, some one hundred and twenty poor men clad in gowns of blue and yellow and carrying staves, thirty-odd standardbearers, a number of gentlemen ushers or whifflers, and, of course, those deputed to attend in either foynes or budge. Other attractions included salutes of ordnance and the City waits. The payment to Munday's son Richard probably does not relate to any work done about the pageant itself; a Draper like his father, as well as a painter-stainer, he was frequently involved in refurbishing banners and pictures for the Company.

The pageant itself cost a little over £150 or approximately one quarter of the £540 disbursed by the Bachelors. David Bergeron asserts that the tableaux of The Sunne in Aries are organized similarly to those of Middleton's 1619 Show, The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity, but are rather more elaborate.10 There seems to be little ground for this; the Skinners' Show was considerably more expensive, costing £728. 04. 07,11 and for this one would expect accordingly more elaborate tableaux. And this appears to be the case. On the other hand, the first and last tableaux of The Sunne in Aries are fairly rudimentary and the third requires little in the way of stage or props. In fact, the efforts of Christmas and the bulk of the Drapers' money seem to have been primarily employed in the master-triumph, the Brazen Tower of Vertue: appropriately enough since not only does Middleton tell us that "Vertue being indeed as a brazen wall to a City or Common-wealth" brings material prosperity as well as spiritual well-being, but the device itself has to make a double appearance.

Had Middleton not chosen to depart from his usual practice of titling his pageants The Triumphs of plus the particular virtue or virtues he had decided to celebrate that year, he might well have called The Sunne in Aries, The Triumphs of Fame and Justice, for it is the intimate association of these two in the person of the magistrate that preserves the peace and prosperity of the commonwealth. Throughout the pageant Middleton emphasizes that it is the exercise of virtue in the heroic task of just government which leads both private individuals (who are "best Knowne" to their virtues) and magistrates (be they Lord Mayor or sovereign) to the reward of Fame. If Barkham is successful (and the pageant does not admit much doubt), then he himself will, in due course, become one of the luminaries who guides "those to come."

The atypical title The Sunne in Aries is important for this reason; it stresses the cyclical, endless nature of the quest for justice in this world embarked on by each magistrate. David Bergeron has commented that this emphasis on the cyclical is a typical feature of civic pageants, deriving ultimately from the structure of the mystery cycles, and allying the form closely with the history play. In connection with The Sunne in Aries, he discusses the typologically significant figure of Jason and the references to the deeds of former Draper worthies. Jason and the worthies are precedents whose example the new Lord Mayor can do no better than to follow: their "Tracts / 'Tis comely to pursue all Thy Lifes Race, / Taking their Vertues, as thou holdst their place." What Bergeron does not mention is the extent to which this idea of cyclical time unifies the pageant. In contrast to The Triumphs of Truth there is no attempt to attain unity through dramatic means. Middleton simply presents us with four relatively discrete tableaux, explicated by speakers who expound the relationship of virtue and government and at the same time honour the Lord Mayor, who is the current exemplar of that relationship, and the Company which, in theory at least, has nurtured him. Per-vading all the tableaux, however, is the notion that the Lord Mayor, by embodying the virtues of his worthy predecessors, will in turn prove a guide to his successors. The work of Justice "lights into a Noble hand to Day, / And ha's past many; Many more, it may."

Middleton's introduction to the pageant emphasizes that Barkham's inauguration represents the beginning of a new year; the sun has entered Aries (as Barkham himself has joined the Drapers' Company) and this will now prove "the Spring time of Right and Justice." The image of the zodiac provides a suitable fiction for beginning the pageant, although it actually took place in October. At the same time the controlling analogy of the sun, "perhaps the most ubiquitous and ancient politico-religious image;"is initiated. The sun is both Sol Iustitiae and its incarnation on Earth, the magistrate, who owes "To Justice his lifes Flame, (shot from Above)," and now must "cheere oppressed Right with lookes of Love" (11. 242-43). Aries, which marks the exaltation of the sun is, of course, a most appropriate period for the new magistrate to start his task. The image of the Sun of Justice is one that Middleton uses elsewhere. In The Triumphs of Honor and Vertue, 1622, a sun appears above the Continent of India and the black Queen of Merchandise explains its significance:

And as yon sun his perfect splendour shows,
Cheering the plants, and no clouds interpose,
His radiant comforts, so no earthy part,
Which makes eclipses in a ruler's heart,
(As in that glorious planet) must come nigh
The Sun of Justice: all such mists must fly.
(VII, 359)
The sun and the mists which block it are favourite images of Middleton's, but they are particularly suited to the pageants he wrote for the Drapers' where they represent the verbal equivalent of the Company's arms. It is interesting to speculate on the likelihood of Middleton knowing that the grant conferring the arms describes Christ as "le celestiel et Imperial soleile le plus glories Roy et sire de toute Justice," thus making clear the significance of the charge of the sun's rays. If he did, he preferred to ignore the overtly religious symbolism in favour of interpreting the Triple Crown as Faith, Hope, and Charity; the Cloud as Care; and the sunbeam as a "Care discharg'd with Honour."

The opening tableau of The Sunne in Aries is the Chariot of Honor; it "attends his Lordships most wished arrivall, in Pauls Church-yard." In the chariot are several worthies of whom Caesar, Alexander, Hercules, and that inevitable figure of Drapers' iconography, Jason, are identified. The Bachelors' Accounts specify that it was "drawne with twoe pellited lyons," the supporters of the Company's arms; there is no mention of them in the text, but this was doubtless an oversight on Middleton's part. Each of the worthies carries an appropriate emblem; Jason's is, of course, the Golden Fleece. To him, as the "Personage most proper" is given the task of addressing the Lord Mayor. None of this suggests a very complex tableau; only a chariot is required, presumably mounted on the usual "quadrangle frame," seeming to be drawn by the lions, and large enough to contain some half-dozen children.

The occupants of the chariot are all types of heroic virtue who "have got Trophies of Honour by their Labours & Deserts." Jason, by reason of his "manifestation" is spokesman and elucidates the parallel between himself and Barkham. The association of hero and Company is an obvious one, first used by the Drapers in 1522 when they planned, although did not execute, a pageant of the Golden Fleece for the Midsummer Show. The Fleece is the Company's crest and so this tableau is an example of a technique common in civic pageantry, the use of the armorial bearings of an individual or Company as the basis of a tableau. Jason explains that just as he "Assisted by the noble Hopes of Greece" set forth on his dangerous voyage to Colchis to obtain the Fleece, so the Lord Mayor, assisted by his brethren, must brave the perils of his year's voyage in order to return from the land of Justice with "Honour, Lifes most precious Trading." The basis of the analogy is stated explicitly, if conventionally, by Jason:

"State is a Sea; he must be wise indeede.
That sounds It's Depth, or can the Quick sands heede;
And Honour is so nice and rare a Prize,
'Tis watcht by Dragons, Venamous Enemies;

(11. 67-70)

The image of the mayoralty as a "Yeares voyage" reminds us of the opening reference of the pageant to the sun entering the zodiac.

The next tableau is the Brazen Tower of Vertue, referred to by Middleton as "the Master-Triumph." His description of it suggests that it was the most elaborately decorated tableau in the Show, and this is fitting since it is used again, this time in conjunction with the Fountain of Justice, for the final presentation to the Lord Mayor. The tower is supposedly made of brass, but "the Top-Turrets or Pinacles...shine bright like Golde." On these battlements "stand 6. Knights, 3. in Silvered, and 3. in Gilt Armour, as Vertues Standerbearers or Champions." These are presumably identical with the six warders mentioned in Fame's speech from the tower. Each holds a banner displaying the arms of a Company worthy, "An Ensigne of good Actions." Barkham's ensign is in the centre of this group, and Fame's insistence that "all may reade, and see" his motto suggests that the tower cannot have been very high. If we accept L. J. Morrissey's figures for the dimensions of pageant wagons, then the maximum height of the tower would be 15 feet. This is certainly too high since it would make the effective display of Barkham's arms very difficult. Morrissey's lower figure of 6-12 feet, presumably towards the upper limit, seems more likely. The two remaining figures are Fame, and Antiquity "the Register of Fame," presumably the latter carries a scroll. It is possible that these two would be at scaffold level, but since Fame is described as speaking "from" the tower, it seems more likely that they were either located on a niche or platform at some level on the tower, or that they appeared with the other figures on the battlements.

The nature of pageantry and of Lord Mayor's Shows in particular made Fame a popular figure. According to Middleton, she is here "properly adorned," indicating that the frequency of iconographical representation of this figure made it unnecessary to waste time and space on a more elaborate description. However, Dekker's description of her in The Magnificent Entertainment (1604) allows us to visualize her appearance: she wore "a Watchet Roabe, thickly set with open Eyes, and Tongues, a payre of large golden Winges at her backe, a Trumpet in her hand, a Mantle of sundry cullours traversing her body: all these Ensignes displaying but the propertie of her swiftnesse, and aptnesse to disperse Rumors." Antiquity is a frequent companion of Fame's. She appears with a scroll in her hand as the Keeper of Honor's records in The Triumphs of Honor and Industry (1617). In fact, this tableau, the Castle of Honor, bears a marked resemblance to the Tower of Vertue. She is also an important figure in The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity (1619), where she describes her function as the "Mother of Truths:" recording good works "that after-times may see / What former were, and how they ought to be / To meet heaven's blessings, to which much is owing." The six warders are all suitable figures for the defence of Vertue; Zeal is a familiar Middleton figure, first used by the dramatist in his contribution to The Magnificent Entertainment, and Wisdom is a minor figure in the Chariot of Fame in The Triumphs of Honor and Vertue (1622).

Jason's references in the previous tableau to the grave senators who will accompany Barkham and act as guides and instructors are made explicit in this segment of the show. Here the results of the magistrate's personal voyage for Honour and Justice are represented by the Brazen Tower of Vertue; "Vertue being indeed as a Brazen wall to a City or Common-wealth, & to Illustrate the prosperity it brings to a Kingdom, the Top-Turrets or Pinacles of this Brazen Tower shine bright like Golde." The role of the Lord Mayor in promoting a peaceful, prosperous kingdom is expounded by Fame who reinforces her argument by pointing to Antiquity whose Golden Legend contains the names and titles of such previous worthies of the Drapers' Company as Henry Fitz-Alwin, Francis Drake, Simon Eyre, and a variety of other benefactors. Their good deeds and Barkham's worthiness to join them are symbolized by the ensigns held by the warders, another example of the frequent use of armorial bearings. The end of Fame's speech eulogizing Fitz-Alwin, the first mayor of London, who held office for twenty-four consecutive years, as the watch of Truth drives home the import of the tableau; Barkham is urged that in the same way as "Men set their Watches by the Sunne," he must "Set Justice" according to what Fitz-Alwin has achieved. Perfect Justice will then be assured.

The Tower of Vertue then joins the procession which conducts the Lord Mayor to the new Standard where the third tableau takes place. This presentation is particularly interesting for the manner in which it incorporates a topographical feature of the City into the symbolic framework of the tableau. R. B. Parker in his Revels edition of A Chaste Maid in Cheapside comments on Middleton's ability in that play to integrate setting and theme, remarking that he was able to put this to effective use in his City pageants. Middleton's use of the new Standard here is a fine example of that technique, but it is one that has not been noticed by previous commentators on the pageant who have assumed that this tableau is simply a continuation of the previous Tower of Vertue, ignoring the practical problems that this assumption entails. How, for instance, did Fame and the warders metamorphose themselves during the procession into the figure in "a cloudy Ruinous Habit" and six monarchs? The confusion arises largely from Middleton's syntax; it is necessary to realize that his reference to the "Turret" (1.170) against which the figure is leaning is to that of the new Standard, not the "turret" of the Brazen Tower. Middleton is thus using the architectural features of the Standard as a visual symbol, giving dramatic effect to the words of the speaker.

At the end of the second decade of the seventeenth century the Standard was in a poor state of repair and indeed had been partially pulled down. It had been adorned with statues and, on the top, with a figure of Fame blowing a trumpet. Its rebuilding "in more strong and beautifull manner" was completed in 1621; according to Middleton, the City government had given orders for this at the same time as it elected Barkham to the dignity of Lord Mayor. That it was rebuilt to much the same design is demonstrated by La Serre's engraving of the entry of Marie de Médicis in 1638 which shows it conforming to earlier descriptions. Middleton uses the "turret," that is the railed dome at the top, as an "upper stage" for the speaker who surely represents the spirit of the new Standard, and incorporates the figure of Fame and her trumpet into the imagery of his speech. The spirit is animated and transformed, casting off his "ruinous" attire to be revealed in bravery by the sound of the trumpet, and, looking up, he sees indeed "Fame fixt upon my Head." It is as if the whole structure has come to life to praise the beneficent government of King, City, and Lord Mayor. The Spirit is then able to use the Standard, "Vertues faire Aédifice" as another concrete instance of the "Cities Goodnes." Beneath the Spirit, presumably on some sort of scaffold stage, sit six royal figures, the Tudors and King James. (These may have been either children or carved figures.)
Figure 11: The entry of Marie de Médicis, showing the Cheapside Cross and the new Standard.

The function of the magistrate as preserver of the peace and well-being, both spiritual and material, of the kingdom is one of the two themes of the speech by the newly-transformed spirit of the Standard. In this tableau, however, it is the magistrate as king which is emphasized. Touching on a topic that he was to develop in The Triumphs of Integrity, Middleton insists that goodness as well as high birth is necessary in the ruler, for otherwise he will inherit only an earthly kingdom. The Lord Mayor as the King's substitute must imitate his master's chief virtue, that of peacemaker; it is of course a virtue that James considered to be peculiarly his own:

> Strive to preserve this Famous Citties peace
> Begun by yon' first King, which do's encrease
> Now by the last; from Henry that joynde Roses
> To James that Unites Kingdomes, who encloses
> All in the Armes of Love, Malic't of None.

(11.203-7)

The repetition of the phrase "Armes of Love" from the preceding tableau strengthens the typological significance—James, like Jason and the Draper worthies, is an exemplar for the new Mayor.

The other theme of the tableau emphasizes concrete examples of the City's good works, the rebuilding of the Standard and the wisdom of its choice of Barkham as Mayor. Middleton neatly uses the restored fountain, a building that must have been something of a talking-point in 1621, as a scenic device; its figure of Fame and her trumpet providing the impetus that causes the transformation of the speaker. The speech, however, is much less effective than the visual symbol. The comparison of ruined men and monuments is rather strained, and one may wonder whether Barkham, if he paid sufficient attention to the words to take in their full import, found the "instance" apparent.

The fourth tableau "neere S. Lawrence Lane" is an elaboration of the basic device of the mountain. This one is "Artfully raysde and replenisht with fine woolly Creatures," the sheep from which the Drapers and England derived much of their wealth. On the top are Phoebus, Aries, and the other signs of the zodiac. All previous editors and commentators assign the speech from the mountain to Aries; this, however, necessitates emending the punctuation of Q (see p.149). The uncertainty leads to difficulties in reconstructing the appearance of the tableau. If Aries is the speaker, what did he look like? Aries does not appear as a human character in any dramatic work of the period, nor do I know of any pictorial representation of the sign in human form. In contrast, Phoebus is a regular character in plays, entertainments, and pageants, and so there are frequent descriptions of his appearance. Given the conservative nature of the Lord Mayor's Show, with tableaux and characters generally having a long history of use, it is more probable that the speech belongs to Phoebus. If this is so, the phrase "the proper Signe for Illustration" would simply mean that Aries, that is the ram as Golden Fleece, exemplifies the nearness of the Drapers' Company to the fountain of light, the sun.

According to the text, Phoebus is "shining in a full Glory" surrounded by the twelve signs of the zodiac, with Aries nearest "the principall Rayes." A glory was a device used in medieval and pageant theatres (and indeed until the nineteenth century), deriving ultimately from the analogous mandorla of painting, the almond-shaped enclosure for heavenly beings. In dramatic use it could vary, according to George Kernodle, from a simple enclosure to a complex machine for ascents and descents. The OED cites examples of glory in an artistic context from the mid-seventeenth century, but makes no mention of it in a dramatic sense. However, it is certainly used in a similar way in John Sadler's closet masque Mascarade du Ciel (1640) where the Great Queen of the little world is visualized sitting "Circled about with a Glory of Rayes." This suggests that Phoebus, perhaps played by a child, sat on the top of the mountain, circled by rays and then by the signs of the zodiac, with Aries nearest to him.

The tableau functions as a distillation of all that has gone before; we return to the sun, both the symbol of all magistrates and the light which tests all deeds and reveals them in their true colours. The good works of Barkham, which were displayed emblematically in the second tableau, are now so illumined and refined by the sun's light that they can stand

Undazled, as one Beame Faces another, as we match a Jem
With her Refulgent fellow;

(11. 226-228)

Barkham's example can now illuminate the way for others. Middleton continues by explaining the significance of the tableau. The mount is, of course, the City, and, by extension, the commonwealth; the sheep the people; the sun the magistrate—as the dramatist remarks a time-honoured analogy. And as the beams of the sun cheer and warm the sheep, so the actions of the magistrate who derives his own light from that of the sun must "cheere oppressed Right with Lookes of Love," ensuring that in turn "the Beames of all cleare Comforts" will continue to shine upon him. The speech effectively gathers up the threads of the previous tableaux: the transforming power of light, which we have seen earlier in the Golden Fleece and the Brazen Tower with its golden battlements, is here revealed as yet another attribute of the sun, the fountain of light and justice, represented on Earth by the magistrate.

The final tableau is the triple-crowned Fountain of Justice. It, in conjunction with the Brazen Tower, stands "ready planted" outside Barkham's house to welcome him on his return from the service at St. Paul's. In the same description Middleton claims that "the whole state of the Triumph" attends the Lord Mayor to and from the Cathedral; however, for the two tableaux to be "ready planted" they would have to have left the procession at some point in order to be reassembled outside the house. The use of two tableaux may well be an example of the "multiple-staging" described by L. J. Morrissey as being common in the post-Restoration Shows. The fountain, however, lacks a speaker of its own, borrowing Fame from the Brazen Tower to explicate its significance. The fountain is presumably triple-tiered to allow for the representation of the Drapers' arms, the triple crown with cloud and sunbeam. On the stage area around it are a host of allegorical personages representing the "Graces and Vertues" appropriate to a magistrate. Each holds an identifying emblem in one hand and a taper in the other signifying purity.
Since this tableau must have been presented after dark the tapers also helped to light it. Some of these figures are familiar to us from other Middleton pageants: Industry with the golden ball on which stands a Cupid, and Truth with her fan of stars.

Middleton uses the fountain to signify that the virtues of a magistrate spring from justice, but extends its implications by associating it with the Drapers' arms and the Brazen Tower. The light-dark antithesis that we have seen throughout the pageant is continued in this final tableau. The charges of the armorial bearings, with the sun issuing through the cloud, make it, of course, particularly appropriate. In this case the light is intended to represent the love that the Company has shown Barkham in celebrating his triumph; these lines and the comparison of its love to the sun after an eclipse, although conventional enough, take on a certain picquancy when we consider the effort the Company made to avoid paying. Fortunately, as Fame points out, Barkham is worthy of the Drapers' love; his actions are luminous like diamonds and would speak for themselves even without magnificent celebrations. This is because they spring from the man's internal qualities and owe nothing to other people. The pageant ends with Fame's explication of the significance of the arms:

The Triple Crowne, is Charity, Truth, and Hope,
Those three Cælestiall Sisters, the Cloude too
That's Care, and yet you see the Beame strikes through;
A Care discharg'd with Honour, it presages,
And may it so continue, to all Ages;

(11. 300-304)

Although Middleton eschews dramatic unity in The Sunne in Aries, the pageant is, nevertheless, a tightly controlled series of expositions on the theme of the office of a magistrate. This control is achieved largely by Middleton's variations in the use of the imagery of the sun, drawing effectively on the range of attributes of this popular symbol both to define the heroic task which Barkham is about to begin and to encourage him to complete it with honour. The sun becomes the ultimate exemplar, transcending by its light those others who act as precedents for him.

However, for all Middleton's and Christmas' skill, the pageant did not particularly impress one spectator. John Chamberlain wrote to Sir Dudley Carleton on 10 November, 1621: "I forbare the last weeke because here was nothing to write but of my new Lord Maiors Pageants, and the old Mayors failing, who the night before he shold have accorned his successor to Westminster did sgombrare [clear out], conveyeng all of worth out of his house and himself with his wife into some secret corner in the countrie, where ever since he hath plaide least in sight." Not surprisingly, Chamberlain is interested only in the scandalous behaviour of Sir Francis Jones and not in the "noble solemnity" of The Sunne in Aries.

Textual Introduction

The Sunne in Aries was printed in 1621, probably shortly after its performance on 29 October, by Edward Alide for Henry Gosson. It is the only one of Middleton's mayoral pageants not printed by Nicholas Okes.
As with both The Triumphs of Integrity and The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity, there is no entry for it in the Stationers' Register and no record of arrangements for its printing in the Drapers' Company accounts. It seems likely, however, that Middleton, Christmas, and Munday's joint responsibility for all "Chardges incident to those shewes" (p.322) included this. The involvement of a publisher is unusual in the printing of Lord Mayor's Shows, and Gosson's connection with The Sunne in Aries suggests that some copies were intended for public sale rather than distribution by the Drapers. If so, then the edition size was probably somewhat larger than the five hundred copies generally required by the Company putting on the Show. Gosson had a long-standing partnership with Allde; five of the nine books listed by Morrison as printed by Allde in 1621 were for him. The Sunne in Aries was printed during the last ten years of Allde's career when the output of his shop appears to have declined from its peak period of 1608-18; despite this he possessed two presses, although it is doubtful whether both were fully used.

The text is in quarto, collating A-B4 (eight leaves). The contents are A1, A1V blank, A2 title, A2V blank, A3 dedication, A3V blank, A4-B4V text. The verse speeches are printed in italic (reproduced in roman in this edition) and the prose descriptions of the pageant in roman. Three copies are extant, preserved in the British Library, the Henry E. Huntington Library and the National Library of Scotland.

Analysis of the printing-house history of all three of Middleton's pageants for the Drapers' Company, and of many other texts of Lord Mayor's Shows, is complicated by two factors. First, the scarcity of copies makes it dangerous to speculate on the nature and extent of the proof-reading and press-correction. And, second, the brevity of the texts, often running to no more than two sheets, makes it often difficult to identify the sequence of running-titles and hence skeleton formes: sheet A for instance of _The Sunne in Aries_ has only one running title—on A4\(^{V}\).

Two of the three extant copies of Q are invariant, but inner A is corrected in the copy belonging to the National Library of Scotland. Since the rest of the text is clean with no literals or obvious misprints, it is possible that this represents a second round of press-correction. Two of the variants in the NLS copy, those on the title page (A2), indicate that it is the corrected state. The missing _and_ has been added after SIMON in 1.16 and the line correspondingly re-justified, and, in the following line, the _s_ of IVDEs has been replaced by a small cap. The variant ornament on A4 in the NLS copy is therefore also the later state. Presumably it was changed either to improve the look of the text (as would be consonant with the title-page corrections) or because the ornaments in the uncorrected state were required elsewhere. 38

The most likely order of formes through the press would seem to have been outer A, inner A, inner B, outer B. There are no running-titles on inner A and only one, _The Sunne in Aries_ on A4\(^{V}\), on outer A. This title was transferred to B1\(^{V}\) and three new titles set. A new set, The Sunne in _Aries_, was constructed for outer B. This suggests that two skeletons were used, one for outer A which was then transferred to inner B with the addition of three new titles, and a second for inner A which was then transferred to outer B. Sheet A was set with little regard to saving space: A1, A1', A2, and A3' are blank, and the text is set with generous spacing between prose description and verse speech. With sheet B, however, a decision seems to have been made to avoid running over into a third sheet. In contrast to sheet A, the text on both formes of B is cramped; a smaller roman type face is used for the prose passages and the number of lines to a page increased, with a corresponding reduction in spacing. This is especially true of inner B, suggesting that copy for the pageant was cast-off; by the time inner B was set it would have been obvious that the change of type face and general economizing on space were insufficient, hence the extra crowding in this forme.

There is no evidence from spelling-variants to suggest that the text was set by more than one compositor; however, the difference in handling prose and verse passages on B2' and B3 compared to the rest of Q may point to the presence of a second workman. Elsewhere in the text the first line of the prose descriptions is indented and the remainder set flush with the left-hand margin. On each of these two pages, however, the first line is set flush in the larger roman type used in sheet A, and the remaining lines, in the smaller type, are slightly indented. In addition, neither of the speeches on these pages have headings identifying the speakers and the speeches themselves lack the large initial capital found in the rest of the text. However, the random distribution of spelling and punctuation preferences, which do not coincide with any bibliographical units, argues against such a conclusion. Some habits of the compositor of Q can be traced in the setting of the final sheet of John Taylor's A Shilling or the Travailes of Twelvepence. This was printed by Alide in 1621, having been entered in the Stationers' Register to Gosson on 3 November, and was therefore probably printed within a month or so of Q. Characteristics in common include an addiction to emphasis capitals, including their frequent erroneous use for adjectives and verbs, the lack of a strong preference for either form of me/mee etc., and certain preferred spellings, for example cittie, neere. In The Sunne in Aries the letters most often erroneously capitalized are I, G, R, and N. Although a few of these may have derived from copy, the evidence of the Trinity MS of A Game at Chess, suggests that most are compositorial.

The spelling of Q indicates that Middleton's holograph, as would be most likely, served as printing-house copy. The evidence for this and for the compositor's fidelity to copy is not as strong as David Lake, in his brief treatment of Middleton's pageants, claims; nevertheless, there seems no reason to doubt his conclusions. The Trinity MS provides considerable holograph material for tracing Middleton's orthographical habits. It is of course contemporaneous with the Drapers' pageants. The strongest evidence for holograph copy is the consistency of Middleton's preferred spellings for 'em (e'm), has (ha's), and does (do's). E'm occurs twice (B2V, B4V), but there is also one instance of them; ha's seven times (B2, B2V, B4) with no instance of hath; do's five times, not four as Lake claims, (A3, A4V, B2, B3, B3V) with no instance of doth. I have examined on microfilm four other books printed by Allde in 1621 and there is no instance of ha's or do's in them and only one of é'm. Other Middleton preferences in Q include the use of the suffix -nes (constant) and the long form of me/mee, he/he, etc. The distribution of these variant spellings does not fall into any discernible bibliographical pattern (for example, on B2 there are two instances each of me and mee in unjustified lines), suggesting that the compositor did not have a strong preference for either form. Examples of Middleton's frequent formation of the voiced preterite and past participle in -d or de occur some twelve times, but -'d or ed are more usual. In addition Middleton's predilection for the digraph survives in certain words, for instance, not just in Caesareus, Phoebus, etc., but also cælestiaal, cobaerd, aequality, aedifice, aegle. This occurs only rarely in the other Allde books and The Triumphs of Integrity and The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity, both printed by Nicholas Okes. Less conclusive is the spelling of other words listed by Price et al as characteristic of Middleton, for example, aen, toward, onely, favour, beene, bloud, loose (lose); some of these are too common to be much use and others are probably preferences shared with the compositor.

The punctuation of the text is essentially compositorial. Middleton himself punctuated lightly, favouring the comma sometimes even at the end of a speech. In contrast, the punctuation of Q is heavy and not especially clear. The colon and semi-colon are frequent; the period is not. Little attempt has been made to break the prose passages into sentences; the colon is generally used where modern usage would require a period. The semi-colon is used essentially to indicate a long pause and this, as in 1.81, can sometimes be confusing. The contrast between the rather tangled punctuation of Q and the much clearer pointing found in The Triumphs of Integrity and The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity suggests some of the options open to compositors setting from lightly punctuated copy.

The Sunne in Aries has been reprinted three times—in John Nichols' Progresses of King James, vol IV (1828) and in the editions of Middleton's Works by Dyce (vol V, 1840) and Bullen (vol. VII, 1886). Nichols, however, had not seen a copy of the pageant, but instead relied on a transcript made by Malone and purchased for two guineas at the Boswell sale.
This might account for most, if not all, of the numerous errors in his dition. The Dyce text is preferable to Bullen's; both alter the orthography, including regularizing false concords, to conform to nineteenth-century usage, but Dyce is the more careful and sometimes footnotes the reading of Q. The three extant copies have been collated for this edition;
the British Library copy being used to prepare the text.
TO

THE HONOUR

OF HIM, TO WHOM

THE NOBLE FRATERNITY

of Drapers, his worthy Brothers have dedicated their loves in costly Triumphes, the Right Honourable EDWARD BARKHAM, Lord Major of this renowned CITIE.

Your Honour being the Center, where the Lines

Of this Dayes glorious circle meetes and joynes;

Love, Joy, Cost, Triumph, all by You made blest;

There do's my Service too, desire to rest:

At your Lordships command,

THO. MIDDLETON.
Pisces, being the last of the Signes, and the Wayne of the Sunnes Glory; how fitly and desiredly now the Sunne enters into Aries, for the comfort and refreshing of the Creatures, and may bee properly called the Spring time of Right and Justice; observed by the Shepheards Kalender in the Mountaine, to prove a happy Yeare for poore mens causes, Widdowes, & Orphans Comforts; so much to make good the Sunnes Entrance into that noble Signe; I doubt not but the Beames of his Justice will make good themselves.

And first, to begin with the Worthy love of his Honourable Societie to his Lordship, after his Honours returne from Westminster, having received some service upon the water: the first Tryumph by land attends his Lordships most wished arrivall, in Pauls Church-yard, which is a Chariot most Artfully framed & adorned, bearing the Title of the Chariot of Honour: In which Chariot many Worthies are plac'd, that have got Trophies of Honour by their Labours & Deserts, such as Jason, whose Illustration of Honour is the Golden Fleece, Hercules with his Ne plus ultra, upon Pilasters of Silver, a fayre Globe, for conquering Alexander; a Gilt Lawrell for triumphant Caesar, &c. Jason at the approach of his Lordship, being the Personage most proper (by his Manifestation) for the Societies Honour, lends a voyce to these following words.

The Speech presented by Jason.

Be favourable Fates! and a faire Skie Smile on this Expedition, Phoebus Eye
Looke cheerfully, --the Barke is under Sayle
For a Yeares voyage, and a blessed Gale
Be ever with it; 'Tis for Justice bound,
A Coast, that's not by every Compasse found;
And goes for Honour, Lifes most precious Trading,
May it returne with most Illustrious Lading;
A Thing both wisht and hop'te for;--I am Hee
To all Adventurous Voyages, a free
And bountifull well-wisher, by my Name
Hight Jason, first Adventurer for Fame,
Which now rewards my danger, and o're-tops
The Memory of all Perill, or her stops; Assisted by the noble Hopes of Greece,
'Twas I from Colchis fetcht the Golden Fleece; Am One of the first Brothers (on Record)
Of Honour got by Danger: So, great Lord!
There is no Voyage set forth to Renowne,
That do's not sometimes meete with Skies that frowne,
With Gusts of Envie, Billowes of despight,
Which makes the Purchase once atchiev'd, more bright:
"State is a Sea; he must be wise indeede
"That sounds It's Depth, or can the Quick sands heede,
And Honour is so nice and rare a Prize,
'Tis watcht by Dragons, Venamous Enemies;
Then no small care belongs too't,--but as I
With my assisting Argonautes, did try
The Utmost of Adventure, and with bold
And constant Courage, brought the Fleece of Gold; Whose Illustration decks my Memory
Through all Posterities, naming but Mee:
So, Man of Merit, never faint or feare,
Thou hast th' Assistance of Grave Senators, here,
Thy Worthy Brethren; some of which have past
All dangerous Gulfes, and in their bright Fames plac't,
They can Instruct and guide thee and each one That must adventure, and are comming on
To this great Expedition, They will bee
Cheerefull and forward to Encourage Thee;
And Blessings fall in a most infinite Summe
Both on those past, Thy Selfe, and those to come.

Passing from this, and more to encourage the labour of the Magistrate, hee is now conducted to the Master-Triumph called the Tower of Vertue, which for the strength, safety and perpetuity, beares the Name of the Brazen Tower; of which, Integrety keepes the Keyes, Vertue being indeed as a Brazen wall to a City or Common-wealth, & to Illustrate the prosperity it brings to a Kingdome, the Top-Turrets or Pinacles of this Brazen Tower shine bright like Golde, and upon the Gilded Battlements thereof, stand 6. Knights;
3. in Silvered, and 3. in Gilt Armour, as \textit{Vertues} Standerbearers or Champions, holding 6. little Streamers, or \textit{Bl	extsuperscript{v}}] silver Bannerets, in each of which are displayed the Armes of a Noble Brother and Benefactor, \textit{Fame} sounding forth their praises to the world, for the Encouragement of after Ages, and \textit{Antiquity} the Register of Fame containing in her Golden Legend, their Names & Titles; as that of Sir Henry \textit{Fitz-Alwin Draper}, Lord Maior foure and Twenty yeares together; Sir \textit{John Norman}, the first that was rowed in Barge to \textit{Westminster} with Silver Oares, at his owne cost and charges; Sir \textit{Francis Drake}, the \textit{Sonne} of \textit{Fame}, who in two Yeares and tenne Monthes, did cast a Girdle about the world:
The unparaleld, Sir \textit{Symon Eyre}, who built \textit{Leaden Hall} (at his owne cost) a Storehouse for the Poore both in the upper Lofts and lower; the Generous & memorable Sir \textit{Richard} \textit{Champion}, and Sir \textit{John Milborne}, two bountifull Benefactors; Sir \textit{Richard Hardell} in the Seat of Magistracy 6. yeares together, Sir \textit{John Poultnye}, 4. yeares, which Sir \textit{John} founded a Colledge in the Parish of St. \textit{Lawrence Poultnye}, by \textit{Candlewicke streete}, \textit{John Hinde}; a Reedifier of the Parish Church of St. \textit{Swithin} by \textit{London Stone}; Sir \textit{Richard Pipe}, who being Free of the \textit{Leathersellers}, was also from them translated to the Ancient and Honorable Society of \textit{Drapers}; and many whose names for brevities cause I must omit, and hasten to the Honour and Service of the Time present: From the Tower, Fame a personage properly adorned, thus salutes the Great Master of the Day and Triumph.

The Salutation of Fame.

Welcome to Vertues Fortresse, strong, and cleere,
Thou are not onely safe, but glorious, heere;

It is a Tower of Brightnes; such is Truth,
Whose Strength and Grace feeles a perpetuall Youth;
The Walls are Brasse, the Pyramid's fine Gold;
Which showes, 'tis Safeties and Prosperities Hold;

Cleare Conscience, is Lievtenant; Providence, there, Watchfulnes, Wisedome, Constancy, Zeale, Care,
Are the sixe Warders keepe the Watch: tower: sure;
That nothing enters but what's just and pure,

For which effect, both to affright and shame
All slothfull Blouds, that blush to looke on Fame,
An Ensigne of good Actions Each displayes,
That worthy Workes may justly owne their Praise;
And which is cleareliest to be understood,
Thine, shines amidst thy Glorious Brotherhood,
Circled with Armes of Honour, by those, past,
As now with Loves Armes, by the Present, grac't,
And how thy Word do's thy true Worth display;

Fortunæ Mater, Diligentia,
Faire Fortunes Mother (all may reade, and see)

Is Diligence, endeavouuring Industrie:

See here the Glory of Illustrious Acts

All of thy owne Fraternity, whose Tracts
'Tis comely to pursue all Thy Lifes Race,
Taking their Vertues, as thou hold'st their place:

Some, Colledge Founders, Temple-Beautifiers, Whose blest Soules sing now in cælestiall Qires;
Erecters some, of Granaries for the Poore,
Though now converted to some Rich mens Store
(The more the Ages misery) some so rare

For this Fam'd Citties Government, and Care,
They kept the Seate foure Yeares with a faire name,
Some sixe; but One, (the Miracle of Fame)
Which no Society, or Time can match,
Twenty foure Yeares compleate; he was Truths Watch,
He went so right and Even; and the Hand
Of that faire Motion, Bribe could ne're make stand:
And as Men set their Watches by the Sunne,
Set Justice but by that which Hee ha's done,
And keepe it Even, so, from Men to Men,
No Magistrate neede stirre the Worke agen:

It lights into a Noble hand to Day,
And ha's past many; Many more, it may.

By this Tower of Vertue, his Lordship being gracefully conducted toward the new Standard, one in a cloudy Ruinous Habit Leaning upon the Turret, at a Trumpets sounding, suddenly starts and wakes, and in Amazement throwes off his unseemly Garments.

What Noyse is this? wakes me from Ruines Wombe, Hah? blesse me, (Time) how brave am I become? Fame fixt upon my Head? beneath me, round, The Figures of Illustrious Princes, crownd As well for Goodnes, as for State by Birth, Which makes e'm true Heires both to Heaven and Earth? Just 6 in Number; and all blessed Names, Two Henryes, Edward, Mary, Eliza, James, (That Joy of honest Hearts;) and there behold His honour'd Substitute, whom Worth makes bold To undergoe the Weight of this Degree; Vertues faire AEdifice rais'd up like mee: Why here's the Cities Goodnes; shown in either; To raise two worthy Buildings both together; For when they made that Lords Election free I gesse, that Time their charge did perfect Mee: Nay note the Cities Bountie in both, still, When they restore a Ruine, 'tis their Will To be so Noble in their Cost and Care All blemish is forgot, when they repaire: For what ha's beene Reedified alate But lifts it's Head up, in more glorious State:
"'Tis Growen a Principle; Ruines, built agen,
"Come betterd both in Monuments and Men:
The Instance is apparent; On then, Lord,
Ee'n at thy Entrance thou'dst a Great mans Word,
The noblest Testimonie of faire Worth
That ever Lord had, when he first stood forth Presented by the Citie: Loose not then
A Praise so deere, bestowde not on all Men;
Strive to preserve this Famous Citties peace
Begun by yon' first King, which do's encrease
Now by the last; from Henry that joynde Roses
To James that Unites Kingdomes, who encloses
All in the Armes of Love, Malic't of None,
Our Hearts find that, when Neighbouring Kingdoms grone;
Which in the Magistrates Duty, may well move
A Zealous Care, in all, a Thankfull Love.

After this, for the full close of the Fore-noones Triumph;
neere S. Lawrence Lane, stands a Mountaine Artfully raysde and replenisht with fine woolly Creatures; Phæbus on the Top shining in a full Glory, being circled with the 12.
Cælestiall Signes, Aries plac't neere the principall Rayes, the proper Signe for Illustration; thus greetes his Lordship.

Bright Thoughts, Joy and Alacrity of Heart
Blesse thy great Undertakings, 'tis the part
And property of Phoebus, with his Rayes,
To cheere and to Illumine Good-mens Wayes;
Eagle-Eyde Actions, that dare behold
His Sparkling Globe, depart, tryed all like Gold;
'Tis Bribery and Injustice, Deedes of Night
That flye the Sunne-beame, which makes good Works bright Thine looke uppon't, Undazled, as one Beame Faces another, as wee match a Jem
With her Refulgent fellow; from Thy Worth Example Sparkles, as a Starre shootes forth:
This Mount, the Type of Eminence and place,
Resembles Magistracies Seate, and Grace;
The Sunne, the Magistrate himselfe, Implyes;
These woolly Creatures, all that Part which Lyes
Under His charge and office, (not unfit)
Since Kings and Rulers are (in holy Writ)
With Shepheards paraleld, nay from Shepheards Rear'd,
And People and the Flock as oft cohaerd;
Now, as it is the Bounty of the Sunne
To spread his Splendors, and make Gladnes runne
Over the drooping Creatures; it ought so
To be His proper Vertue, that do's owe
To Justice his lifes Flame, (shot from Above)
To cheere oppressed Right with lookes of Love,
Which nothing doubted; Truths reward light on you,
The Beames of all cleare Comforts shine upon You.
The Great Feast ended, the whole state of the Triumph attends upon his Lordship both to Paules, and homeward; and neare the Entrance of his Lordships House, two Partes of the Triumph stand ready planted, viz. The Brazen Tower, and the Triple-Crowned Fountaine of Justice; this Fountaine being adorn'd with the lively Figures of all those Graces and Vertues which belong to the faithfull discharging of so high an Office; as Justice, Sincerity, Meeknes, Wisedome, Providence, Equality, Industry, Truth, Peace, Patience, Hope, Harmony; all Illustrated by proper Emblems and expressions; as Justice, by a Sword; Sincerity, by a Lambe; Meeknes, by a Dove; Wisdome by a Serpent; Providence, by an Aegle; Equality, by a silverd Ballance; Industry, by a golden Ball, on which stands a Cupid; intimating, that Industry brings both Wealth and Love; Truth with a Fanne of Starres, with which she chases away Error; Peace, with a Branch of Laurell; Patience, a Sprig of Palme; Hope, by a silver'd Anchor; Harmony, by a Swan; Each at Night holding a bright burning Tapor in her hand, as a Manifestation of Purity: His Lordship being in sight, and drawing neare to his Entrance; Fame, from the Brazen Tower closes up the Triumph, his Lordships honourable welcome, with the noble Demonstration of his worthy Fraternities Affection; in this concluding Speech.
I cannot better the Comparison
Of thy faire Brotherhods Love, then to the Sunne
After a great Ecclipse; for as the Sphære
Of that Cælestiall Motion, shines more cleere
After the Interposing Part is spent,
Then to the Eye before the Darknes went Over the bright Orbe; so Their Love is showne
With a Content past Expectation:
A Care that ha's beene comely, and a Cost That ha's beene Decent; cheerefull, (which is most Fit for the Service of so great a State,
So fam'd a Cittie, and a Magistrate
So worthy of it all) ha's beene bestowde Upon thy Triumph, which ha's clearely showde
The Loves of thy Fraternity; as great,
For thy first Welcome to thy honour'd Seate:
And happily is Cost requited then,
"When Men Grace Triumphs, more then Triumphs, Men;
"Diamonds will shine though set in Lead, True worth
"Stands alwayes in least neede of setting forth:
What makes Lesse Noyse then Merit? or Lesse Showe
Then Vertue? 'tis the Undeservers, owe
All to Vaine-glory, and to Rumour, still;
Building their Praises on the Vulgar Will;
All their Good, is without e'm, not their owne,
When wise men to their Vertues are best Knowne:
Behold yon' Fountaine with the Tripled Crowne,
And through a Cloude the Sunne-beame piercing downe,
So is the worthy Magistrate made up;
The Triple Crowne, is Charity, Faith, and Hope,
Those three Cælestiall Sisters, the Cloude too
That's Care, and yet you see the Beame strikes through;
A Care discharg'd with Honour, it presages,
And may it so continue, to all Ages;
It is thy Brotherhods Armes, how well it fits Both Thee, and All, that for Truthes Honour sits:
The Time of Rest drawes neere; Triumph must cease
Joy to thy Heart, to all a Blessed peace.

FINIS.

For the Frame-Worke of the whole Triumph; with all the proper Beauties of Workmanship, the Credit of that, justly appertains to the deserts of Master Garret Crismas, a Man excellent in his Art, and faithfull in his Performances.
Press-variants in Q (1621)

Copies collated: BM (British Library C.33.e.7.18), CSmH (Henry E. Huntington Library), NLS (National Library of Scotland).

Sheet A (inner forme)

Corrected: NLS Uncorrected: BM, CSmH

Sig. A2

16 SIMON and] ~X (line correspondingly rejustified)
17 IVDES] IVDEs

Sig. A4

Change of HT ornaments
Substantive Changes.

215 Signes,] Q;~; Nichols;~. Dyce, Bullen
216 Illustration;] Q;~. Nichols, Dyce, Bullen

Textual Notes

130 Lievtenant] Q's Lieutenant may indicate Middleton's pronunciation, corresponding to his spelling Lieftenant.

215-16] Nichols and the rest emend without comment to "circled with the 12 celestial signs; Aries, placed near the principal rays, the proper sign for illustration, thus greets his lordship;" this reverses Q's assignment of the speech. In favour of their emendation, it should be noted that the punctuation of Q probably owes much to the compositor; throughout the text the semi-colon is used as a long pause, sometimes obscuring the logical relationship of clauses. In addition, the speaker does not identify himself although he makes reference to Phoebus; there are no examples of totally third person speeches by a named speaker in any of Middleton's other pageants. Furthermore, the phrase "the proper Signe for Illustration" could mean that Aries is the appropriate speaker to elucidate the tableau. However, the phrase may well simply mean that Aries, the sign representing the Drapers' Company, is fittingly nearest to Phoebus. The break with convention involved in assigning the speech to Aries is a strong argument against the emendation (see p.124). Without more convincing evidence to the contrary, I prefer to follow Q and retain Phoebus as the speaker.
A good example of the way the heavy punctuation of Q can obscure the precise sense of the text. Dyce and Bullen place a semi-colon after it (1. 283), thus making all the subject of bestowde, but this change unnecessarily alters the meaning. The semi-colon and comma of 1. 286 may have become transposed.
Emended Accidentals

45-86] italic in Q
81 thee, ] ～;
116 Stone; ] ～.
124-67] italic in Q
132 Warders ] ～;
173-210] italic in Q
217-45 italic in Q
271-308] italic in Q
280 [which] which 280 most[ ] ～;
283 all)] ～,
285 Fraternity; ] ～.
285 great, ] ～;
Critical Notes

Title-page

5-6 sole cost] A typical formula: the Company presenting a Show did not care to have its generosity minimized, cf. Munday, Chruso-thriambos, sig. C2. In the case of SA, the Drapers tried hard to be relieved of sole responsibility for the cost.

7-8 confirmation and establishment] The confirmation by the King of the City's choice.

13-16] See pp.4-7 for details of route and procedure.

Text

10-13 Your Honour...rest] Compare TLA (Bullen VII, 330): "For love is circular, like the bright sun, / And takes delight to end where it begun."
The four line dedicatory verse seems to be typical of those pageants where Middleton did not have a close relationship with the dedicatee.

15 command] Since Middleton was City Chronologer and supplier of entertainments for civic functions this is literally true.

19-28] From the evidence of No Wit, Middleton does not seem to have held much brief for astrology. However, at least two of his City patrons, Thomas Myddleton and Martin Lumley, were interested in the subject. Whatever Middleton's personal feelings about it, it provides an appropriate fiction for introducing the pageant, cf. Dekker, Britannias Honor (IV, 89): "Your this dayes Progresse(rising like the Sunne,) / Which through the yearely Zodiacke must runne."

21 Aries] the first of the signs of the zodiac; the sun enters it at the vernal equinox (Spring time," 1.22). The legal new year also begins under this sign; hence its appropriateness despite the pageant being performed on 29 Oct. Aries also marks the exaltation of the sun, see John Sadler, Mascarade du Ciel, sig. C4: "Aries, Mars House, is by all Astrologers called the Suns Glory or Exaltation."

23 Shepheards Kalender] A reference to the often reprinted almanac. It contains much astrological lore, including the properties of the signs of the zodiac.

25 Orphans] The City Chamber administered the estates of orphans; Middleton and his sister received their inheritances from it, see Mark Eccles, "TM a Poett," Studies in Philology, 54 (1957), 516. Cf. Dekker, Britannias Honor (IV, 82): "All the City-Orphans call him Father: All the Widdowes call him their Champion."

27 Beames...Justice] Sol Iustitiae; cf. Honourable Entertainments (hereafter HE) ent. v, 11. 11-14: "I, a chiefe Mourner, this a sad Pageant, here, / Set with the Orphans Sigh, the Widowes Teare, / All seeme to mourn, as lockt from their reliefes, / Till the New Sun of Justice dry their griefes."

31 some service] Neither the text nor the Drapers' Accounts specify what this was; it may have been of the type bemoaned by Dekker, Troia-Nova Triumphans (hereafter T-NT; III, 247): "The Title-page of this Booke makes promise of all the Shewes by water, as of these On the Land; but Apollo having no hand in them, I suffer them to dye by that which fed them; that is to say, Powder and Smoake. Their thunder (according to the old Gally-foyist-fashion) was too lowd for any of the Nine Muses to be bidden to it."

38-39] Hercules...Silver] The silver pilasters represent the pillars of Hercules on which was supposedly inscribed ne plus ultra (no more beyond); by the 17th century the words frequently signified the ultimate in perfection, Stanford Dictionary of Anglicised Words and Phrases, 1892.

39-40 a fayre...Caesar, &c.] The globe and the laurel are appropriate for triumphant conquerors; the &c presumably indicates that there are more figures in the Chariot than the four named.

42 Manifestation] the Golden Fleece.

47 Barke] perhaps with a quibble on Barkham.

48 Yeares voyage] the year of Barkham's mayoralty.

51 Trading] The mercantile imagery is particularly appropriate.

63-68] The state/sea analogy is a familiar one and is much used by Middleton and other pageant writers. Cf. IT (VII, 254): "For power's a dangerous sea, which must be sounded / With truth and justice, or man soon runs on / 'Gainst rocks and shelves of dissolution"; THP, 11. 112-121; also Dekker, I-NT (III, 233-34): "thou must saile / In rough Seas (now) of Rule: and every Gale / Will not perhaps befriend thee.../ For (Spite of Fowle gusts) calmer Windes shall fill / Thy Sayles at last."

66 Purchase] "gains, winnings, acquisitions, especially booty, plunder, prize" (OED). In an honourable sense here.

70 Dragons] The Golden Fleece was guarded by a dragon.

71-74] Munday uses the same image in Metropolis Coronata, sig. B1v: the Mayor is told "You are our Jason, Londons glorie, / Now going to fetch that fleece of Fame, / That ever must renowne your name."

75 Illustration] "The action or fact of making clear or evident to the mind; setting forth clearly or pictorially; elucidation; explanation; exemplification" (OED, sense 3).

78 Grave Senators] Members of the Drapers' Company, including the past Worthies whose actions are reviewed in the next tableau in order to "instruct and guide" the new Mayor. Senators is more often used to refer to the aldermen. The Roman terminology was common, cf. Dekker, Britannias Honor, (IV, 82): "The Praetorian Dignity is therefore come from the ancient Romans, to invest with Robes of Honor, our Lord Maior of London: Their Consuls are our Sheriefes: their Senators our Aldermen."

87-88] to encourage...the Magistrate] One of the prime purposes of all Lord Mayor's Shows. As early as 1575, William Smythe comments that an essential ingredient of "the Pagent of Tryumphe" is "some matter tow-chinge Justice, & the office of a majestrate," Drake, Shakespear and his Times, p.424.

91 Integrity] II develops further the role of Integrity in a prosperous commonwealth.

96 Standerbearers] standard-bearers; Middleton's form is not given in OED, although stander appears as an alternate form of standard.

103 Fitz-Alwin] The first Mayor of London, holding office "from at least as early as 1193 till his death in 1212"; whether or not he was a Draper is uncertain (Beaven, II, 225). In Chruso-thriambos Munday uses him to celebrate the Goldsmiths, a lapse (blamed on Stow) that he apologises for profusely in Himatia-Poleos, sig. A4. He has a major role in both Himatia-Poleos and Metropolis Coronata and appears or is referred to in all Middleton's and Heywood's pageants for the Drapers' Company.

104 Norman] Mayor 1453-54; Master of the Drapers' Co. 1462-63; died 1468. According to the pageant writers he was responsible for instituting the custom of going to Westminster by barge, see, Stow, Survey, II, 175. In fact, the custom seems to have been already established by 1422 (Herbert, I, 100). S. Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p. 3, considers that his importance lies in his being the first to go by barge "at his owne cost and charges." This may be so, although many Companies did not acquire a barge of their own until considerably later.

106 Drake] Another voyager who successfully seized the prize of Fame, cf. Geoffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblemes, ed. John Horden (London: Scolar, 1969), p. 203 "this noble minded DRAKE, / Did bringe away his goulden fleece." This emblem and its relationship to the pageants of Middleton and Webster (Drake appears as one of seven famous navigators in Monuments of Honor, 1624) is discussed by Bergeron, Civic Pageantry, pp. 293-94. Middleton's use of Drake here should be compared to that in THP where he is given greater prominence, probably for political reasons. Drake was admitted to the Drapers' Co. by redemption on 17 Nov., 1588, and later became tenant of the Herber, one of its most substantial properties.

107 cast...world] Bullen quotes Dick of Devonshire, c. 1626, referring to Drake: "They would have thought themselves as famous as their Country­ man / That put a girdle round the world." The phrase itself is semi­proverbial, cf. MND, II, i. 175.

108 Eyre] A Draper not a shoemaker. Mayor 1445-46; died 1458. He was never knighted. According to Stow he built the Leadenhall in 1419 "of his owne charges, for the common utilitie of the said Citie...He builded it of squared stone, in forme as now it sheweth, with a fayre and large chappell in the East side of the Quadrant, over the porch of which hee caused to be written, Dextra Domini exaltavit me," Survey, I, 153-54. He also left 5000 marks to charitable uses, hence his appearance in II under the figure of Charity. However, Stow claims that the Drapers failed to perform the terms of his bequest (I, 154). The Leadenhall had a close association with pageants; Stow describes how "three sides were reserved for the most part to the making and resting of the pageants shewed at Midsommer in the watch"(I, 159). Many 17th century Lord Mayor's pageants, though not SA, were built there too. Eyre, as well as appearing in The Shoemaker's Holiday as a citizen hero, is used as an exemplar by Munday and Heywood as well as Middleton in their pageants for the Drapers.

111 [Champion] Mayor 1565-66; knighted 1566; Master of the Drapers' Co. 1557-78, 1560-01, 1568; died 1568. A benefactor to the Co.

111 [Milborne] Mayor 1521-22; knighted 1522; Master of the Drapers' Co. 1515-16, 1522-23, 1528-29, 1533-34; died 1536. A benefactor to the Company. According to Stow, Survey, I, 112, he "builded almes houses fourteene in number, by the crossed Friers Church in London, there to be placed fourteene poor people, and left to the Drapers certaine Messuages, Tenements, and Garden plots, in the parish of St. Olave in Hartstreete, for the performance of stipends to the sayd Almes people, and other uses." He adds later: "These poyntes not performed: the Drapers have unlawfully solde these tenements, and garden plots, and the poore be wronged"(I, 148). Milborne continued to be honoured by the Company, however; the Wardens' Accounts for 1619-20 (+ 469/4, 42b) list the following payment: "to Mr. Christmas for makinge & payntinge the pictures of Sir John Milborne and Sir Richard Champion which are sett upp in the parloure in theire remembrance as benefactors to this Companie x\textsuperscript{11}i." Similarly in 1621-22 Richard Munday, the painter-stainer and son of Anthony, is paid "for paintinge the escutchions of the Armes of Sir Richard Champion, Sir John Milbourne & Mr.Clomee & for the subscription of their names upon byse & in gold."

112 Hardell] His Christian name was Ralph and he was Mayor for four years, from 1254-58 (Beaven, I, 372).

113 Poultney] Mayor 1330-32, 1333-34, 1336-37; knighted 1337; died 1348. He "buiilded a fayre Chappell in Paules Church, wherein he was buried. He founded a Colledge in the parrish Church of St. Laurence called Poultney; he buiilded the parish Church called little Alhallowes in Thames streete; the Carmelite Friers Church in Coventree: he gave reliefe to prisoners in Newgate, and in the Fleet, and ten shillings the year to S. Giles Hospitall by Oldborne for ever, and other legacies long to rehearse" (Stow, Survey, I, 106).

115 Hinde] or Heende. Mayor 1391-92, 1404-05; died 1418.

116 Pipe] Mayor 1578-79; knighted 1579; Master of the Leathersellers' Co. 1566-67; translated to the Drapers' Co. 1571; Master of the Drapers' Co. 1573-74, 1577-78, 1581-82; died 1587. He is included here as a compliment to Barkham.

121 properly adorned] see p.118.

126 such is Truth] Truth was often represented carrying a sun to indicate her piercing splendour, see Allan H. Gilbert, Symbolic Personages in the

She appears with this property in TT (VII, 245).

128 Pyramid] "any structure of pyramidal form, as a spire, pinnacle, obelisk, etc" (OED). Hence identical with the "Top-Turrets or Pinacles" of 11. 93-94.

130 Clear Conscience...Care] Presumably the 6 warders are identical to the 6 knights of 1. 95.

134-35 For which...Fame] Cf. the effect of the sun, 11. 222-25.

136 An ensigne...Actions] either imprese or coats of arms.

140-41 Armes] Punning on both senses of arms. Barkham's shield is surrounded by those of past Drapers in the same way as he himself is surrounded by the loving arms of his Company. Barkham's crest and motto are used again by Middleton in An Invention.

142 Word] motto.

147 Tracts] "fig. Course (of action)" (OED). Barkham is told that he must endeavour to inherit his predecessors' virtues as well as their office.

150 Colledge Founders] Poultney.

152-54 Erecters...misery] Eyre. The flash of satire recalls Middleton the pamphleteer and satiric dramatist, cf. TI, 1. 145 "This Age sits laughing upon Heapes of Gold." It also reminds us that although civic pageants present an idealized view of the commonwealth, Middleton is well aware that ideal and reality do not always correspond.

155 Fam'd Cittie] another child of Fame.

156 foure] Milborne.

157 sixe] Hardell.

157 One] Fitz-Alwin

159 Watch] quibbling on watch as guard as well as time-piece.

159-65] Cf WBW, IV. i. 1-18 where Bianca and her ladies discuss the reliability of their watches. Bianca sets hers by the sun (i.e. the Duke), implying "that her sexual behaviour is above reproach, the sun never varying" (J. R. Mulryne, Revels ed. p. 119). Barkham's justice, administered according to the principles of Fitz-Alwin, is to be as invariable as the sun.

161 Bribe] see also l. 224. Bribery is, of course, an appropriate thing to deplore in a civic pageant, cf. TT and TLA (VII, 260, 320), but in 1621 these references would have been given particular point by the fall of Bacon earlier in the year. Middleton alludes to this in HE, ent. ix, 11. 67-69: "this high Synode of the Parliament, / Before whose faire, cleare and Unbribed Eyes, / (When it appeares) Corruption sincks and dies." Middleton's interest in this event is further attested to by Oldys' note on the contents of the now lost "Annales," see p. 74.
169 the new Standard] The standard was rebuilt in 1620-21 (Sugden, p. 485). It was used as the playing area in this tableau, see pp.120-3. There is a bad joke about the new Standard in Middleton and Webster's Anything for a Quiet Life (Lucas, IV, 78); David Lake, The Canon of TM's Plays, p. 182, assigns it to Webster.

169 one] the spirit of the new Standard.

169 Ruinous] "dilapidated" (OED).

170 Turret] the new Standard, not the Brazen Tower.

170 Trumpets] There was a figure of Fame blowing a trumpet on the top of the Standard.

175 Fame...Head] see, p.121.

184 Vertues AEdifice] Mulryne (WBW, Revels ed., p. 123) comments that Middleton's predilection for building imagery may owe something to his father having been a builder or bricklayer.

186 To raise...together] Glossed by Nichols as "The rhymster here seems to allude to a repair the New Standard had undergone, and perhaps also to the repair of St. Paul's Cathedral." Dyce repeats this with the addition of [!] after rhymster. Bullen was the first to point out that while one building is undoubtedly the Standard, the other is the metaphorical one of Barkham himself who is now being raised to the mayoralty. The speaker explains that when the City elected Barkham it also ordered the rebuilding of the Standard. Whether Barkham would have appreciated the description of himself as a blemished ruin is another matter.

198 Great mans] Jason.

203 peace] Praise for James' policy of peace is common in Middleton's public and civic works, see especially The Peacemaker (1618). It may have sounded slightly ironic in 1621: the summoning of Parliament earlier in the year "released a wave of anti-Spanish sentiment in the country; memories of 'eighty eight mingled with indignation over the Palatinate, renewed instincts of Elizabethan rapine with relief at the King's final waking from his Spanish trance" (Robert Zaller, The Parliament of 1621 (Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1971), p. 26. However, an influential section of City opinion favoured peace.

205-6] Cf. Webster, Monuments of Honor (III, 322): "the Uniter of the devison and houses, Henry the Seaventh, both with White and Red [roses], from whence his Royall Majesty now raigning tooke his Motto for one peice of his Coyne, Henricus rosas regna Jacobus." James fostered the idea of himself as successor to Henry VII, even ordering that he be buried in Henry's tomb in Westminster Abbey.

208-10] The troubles of neighbouring kingdoms which impress upon us the mutual love of king and subject should stimulate the magistrate's zeal in the performance of his office and the gratitude of everyone. The Palatinate and Bohemia were overrun by the Catholic armies during 1620-21.

213 fine...Creatures] sheep.

213-17 Phoebus...Lordship] see pp.124,149. for the relative merits of Phoebus and Aries as speakers.

214 Glory] see p.125.

222 Eagle-Eyde Actions] keen-sighted, capable of discrimination, cf. TT (VII, 244) where Truth wears a robe of white silk "filled with the eyes of eagles, showing her deep insight and height of wisdom."

See also Heywood, Londini Emporia, sig. B1, where the Mayor is urged to "alwayes have an Eagles eye / To out gaze the Sun, and keepe that Aquilant sight / To see what's wrong, and to distinguish right."

223 tryed] refined.

234-37] As Middleton remarks, an ancient analogy--but one, of course, particularly suited to the Drapers' Co.

242 shot from Above] from Sol Iustitiae, cf. Dekker's T-NT (III, 230) "For the Chaires of Magistrates ought to be adorned, and to shine like the Chariot which caries the Sunne; And Beames (if it were possible) must be thought to be shot from the One as from the Other."

246 the whole state] but presumably excluding the Brazen Tower which has to be set up outside Barkham's house.

247 homeward] In July 1621 Barkham was the tenant of a property belonging to the Drapers' Co. in Dowgate, see p.315.

248 two Partes] see p.126.

249 ready planted] already set up.
251 lively] This could mean either living or lifelike; since the figures have to hold tapers at night it would be easier if they were children.

253-55 as Justice...Harmony] There may be more than the twelve named figures on the tableau.

256 Justice...Sword] One of the two common properties of Justice; the scales belong here to AEquality. That Justice was an instantly recognizable figure is indicated by Dekker's comment on Astraea in The Magnificent Entertainment (II, 295): "Havinge tolde you that her name was Justice, I hope you will not put mee to describe what properties she held in her hands, sithence every painted cloath can informe you."

257 Meeknes...Dove] Cf. TT (VII, 253) where Meekness appears "with a garland of mingled flowers, in her hand a white silk banner with a red cross, a lamb at her feet."

257-58 Providence...AEgle] see note to l. 222.

258 AEquality...Ballance] see note to l. 256.

258-60 Industry...Love] In THI, (VII, 298) Industry is "holding a golden ball in her hand, upon which stands a Cupid, signifying that industry gets both wealth and love." Cf. Dekker's figure of Industry in T-NT (III, 235) "in the shape of an old Country-man, bearing on his shoulder a Spade."

260-61 Truth...Error] Cf. TT, (VII, 244) where the fan of stars is a property of Truth who uses it to chase away Error and her minions.
263 Harmony...Swan] In THI (VII, 304) Harmony holds a golden lute; in The Inner-Temple Masque (VII, 213) the figure is referred to as a "white and glorious friend."

271-78] The precise significance of the eclipse analogy is not clear. Perhaps Barkham would have been amused by the references to cheerfulness.

289-90 Diamonds...forth] semi-proverbial; cf. Webster, "A Monumental Columnne" (III, 275): "But as a perfect Diamond set in lead, / (Scorning our foyle) his glories do breake forth." Diamonds were thought to be luminous. For Middleton's variations on the image, see The Changeling II. i. 15-16 (VI, 27) "A true deserver like a diamond sparkles; / In darkness you may see him."; WBW, V, i. 48-9 (VI, 361) "A goodness set in greatness; how it sparkles / Afar off, like pure diamonds set in gold!"

293 Vaine-glory...Rumour] Gilbert, p. 254, defines Vainglory as the opposite of Truth, and Rumour as the opposite of Fame.

294 Vulgar Will] by ingratiating themselves with the commonalty.

297-98] See p.176 for the original significance of the arms. Middleton develops his own interpretation more fully in II.

300-01 Charity...sisters] the theological Graces.

312 Crismas] A noted carver and sculptor, responsible for the design of Aldersgate and the front of the Northumberland House. He became carver to the Royal Navy in 1614 and was involved with civic shows from 1618 until his death in 1634.
Jean Robertson, "Les Rapports," p. 276, comments that fidelity to his promises as well as professional excellence seem to have been characteristic of Christmas.
NOTES

1. The dedications of TT (to Thomas Myddleton) and The Triumphs of Honor and Virtue (hereafter THV; to Peter Proby) suggest a closer relationship than that implied by the rather perfunctory four line dedications of the other pageants. In the case of TT, Middleton may have owed his employment to his namesake.

3. Cf. Sir William Cokayne whose daughter married Baron Howard of Effingham. Barkham was not even one of the Customs Farmers.

5. For St. Antholin's, see pp. 63, 95.

7. Johnson, III, 12, quotes the total cost as £615.07.06. including the payment for beautifying Barkham's house. However, the total disbursed by the Bachelors, £548.04.00, and the £66.13.04 amounts to only £614.17.04; I have been unable to account for the remaining 10/2. Johnson also misquotes the payment from those in foynes as £75.00.00, thereby arriving at the incorrect total for receipts of £564.04.00.

8. There is a payment in the Bachelors' Accounts which may refer to a bid by a competitor: "Item paid to a straunger that drewe the forme of a Pageant for the service x1s" (p.326).

9. Bentley, IV, 895; Sheila Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p. 142 argues that, other than his lack of a scarf, there is no reason for not crediting Munday equally with Middleton for the pageant. For the place of SA in the collaboration and quarrel between Munday and Middleton, see p. 78.

11 MSC III, p. 99.

13 Anglo, Spectacle, p. 81.

14 John Sadler, Mascarade du Ciel (London, 1640), sig. C4, explains that "Aries...is by all Astrologers called the Suns Glory or Exaltation."

15 John A. Goodall, "Heraldry and Iconography," The Coat of Arms, 4, No. 29 (1957), 173, n.8. The crowns represent the triple crown of the Virgin, patroness of the Company.

16 See p. 112; it is possible that Jason was an adult; the silent roles would certainly have been taken by children.

17 Withington, I, 39-40, 179, and PMLA, 30 (1915), 113; Johnson, II, 11 and MSC III, p. 11 all assume that the pageant actually took place. MSC V, p. 4 notes correctly that it was planned, but abandoned because of the pageants (including one of the Fleece) already standing from the entry of Charles V. Perhaps the use of a Fleece pageant to honour the Holy Roman Emperor (head of the order of the Golden Fleece) drew the Drapers' attention to its applicability to themselves. This planned pageant may have been the first e.g. of classical symbolism in a trade pageant, but see p. 87.

19 Bowers, II, 276; Middleton describes her in II (VII, 253): "on her head a crown of silver, and a silver trumpet in her hand, showing both her brightness and shrillness."

20 VII, 323; Antiquity also has a speaking role in THV (VII, 360-2).

21 Eyre (pace Deloney and Dekker) was a Draper not a shoemaker.

23 See, for instance, Bergeron, Civic Pageantry, p. 192.

26. Annales, p. 1034. The account given by Howes makes it clear that the restoration work had been in progress for some years. Since mayoral elections took place on Michaelmas Day (29 Sept), Middleton's version can refer to no more than the final authorization for completion of the work.

27. Middleton had already capitalized on this in The Peacemaker (1618); it is a theme to which he returns in TI.

28. Wickhám, EES, II, i, 214 notes that the tableau is in the same tradition as that of "the Sphere of the Sun," one of the pageants that welcomed Catherine of Aragon in 1501; see also Anglo, Spectacle, p. 72.

29. Thomas L. Berger and William C. Bradford, Index of Characters in English Printed Drama to the Restoration (Englewood, Colo.: Microcard Eds. Books, 1975) list a variety of signs of the zodiac as "characters," but not one of their e.g.s requires an actor to play the role; typical is the inclusion of the signs in No Wit (IV, 324) which are made of "banqueting-stuff."

30. See, for instance, Dekker, Britannias Honor (IV, 93): "the Sunne sits, with golden Beames about his Face; an Attire glittering like gold; and a mantle as bright as his garment, fringed with gold, his haire curled and yellow."

31. From Art to Theater, pp. 62, 142.

35. See Appendix I, p. 308, for an account of the printing of the LMS, 1602-39.

38 Ornaments from both sets were used by Allde during 1621. The initial two blocks of the uncorrected state appear in three rows on sigs. Q2 and Q3 of The French Garden, and the NLS ornament occurs, though not in the same pattern, in John Taylor's A Shilling or the Travailes of Twelvepence.

39 Edward Arber, Register of the Stationers' Company, IV (London; 1887), 23.

41 Lake, p. 273.
THE TRIUMPHS OF Integrity.

A Noble Solemnity, performed through the city, at the sole cost and charges of the Honorable Fraternity of Drapers, at the Confirmation and Establishment of their most worthy Brother, the Right Honorable, Martin Luykset, in the high Office of his Maiesties Lieutenant, Lord Mayor and Chancellor of the famous
City of London.

Taking beginning at his Lordships going and perfecting at five after his Return from receiving the Oath of Maiesties at Westminster, on the Morrow after Simon and Jude Day, being the 29. of October. 1623.

By Tho. Middleton Gent.

LONDON,
Printed by Nicholas Okes, dwelling in Foster-Lane. 1623.

Figure 12.
The Triumphs of Integrity was Middleton's contribution to the celebration of the inauguration of Martin Lumley as Lord Mayor in 1623. Unlike Edward Barkham and Cuthbert Hacket, Lumley was a Draper by patrimony; his father, James, having amassed a substantial fortune from his mercantile interests during the reign of Elizabeth. The Lumleys, however, were not a long-established English family. Martin's grandfather was Domenico Lomelin or Lomeley who settled in England and became a Gentleman of the Bedchamber to Henry VIII, maintaining a troop of horse for him. Martin was born c. 1580, but little is known of his early life; he seems to have entered his father's business, part of which was concerned with retail drapery. In July 1595 he consulted several times with Simon Forman over the stealing of some cloth from his shop in Watling St., apparently a favourite abode of Drapers. By 1611 he was fully involved with Company affairs, becoming an Assistant and serving as Warden in that year. In 1614 he entered City government as both Alderman of Vintry and Sheriff. The following year, 1615-16, he was Master of the Company, a position he was to hold again during his mayoralty in 1623-24. He was knighted in office in May 1624, served as Alderman of Broad St. from 1626 until his death in 1634, and was President of Christ's Hospital from 1632-34.

Lumley seems to have been one of the more strongly Puritan members of the Aldermanic Bench in the 1620s. In 1621 he was a member of the committee that recommended the financing of the St. Antholin's lectures (see p.95) and he provided in his will for a series of lectures at St. Helen's Bishopsgate, the church where he is buried. His son acquired a baronetcy, became M.P. for Essex in 1640, and two years later was one of the members who contributed "horses, money, and plate for the defence of Parliament"—his share amounting to four horses.

Perhaps as a result of his long association with the Company, Lumley's triumph was more elaborate and expensive than those of his Draper predecessors. Certainly, as Master of the Company during the preparations he would have been able to influence spending. The entire Show, including contributions from both House and Bachelors, cost £708. 0l. 04. Its most interesting feature, however, was the employment of two authors, Middleton and Munday, who were paid individually to provide separate parts of the Show; each then published a separate account of his work. Middleton wrote The Triumphs of Integrity which consisted (according to his text), of a water-show, called the Imperial Canopy, and four land devices: a Mount Royal, the Chariot of Sacred Memory, the Temple of Integrity, and the Imperial Canopy again. Munday wrote The Triumphs of the Golden Fleece, a tableau without speeches of the Argo with Jason, Medea, and the Argonauts which, he claimed, constituted the "water-service." Munday further asserts that "the Service being performed upon the Water, the like is done on the Land, all the rest of the day following always attending his honors service, and for adding the more splendor to the Triumphs Solemnitie" (sig. A4v). The curiously vague phrase "the like" seems to indicate that Munday's tableau was part of the land procession. Both authors are conspicuous for their failure to mention the existence of the other's work, each giving the impression that his was the sole pageant.

This strange state of affairs was first noticed by Robert Withington. He at first thought that the Munday tableau was a rejected plan for the Show, but on consulting the Drapers' records realized that the Company's separate payments precluded this. He then conjectured that "after Middleton's pamphlet had been printed, the Argo was substituted for the Canopy which he had intended to put on the river.... Munday planned the festivities on the water, and Middleton confined himself to those on land. If the latter had intended to show an Imperial Canopy on the Thames, his plans were evidently changed; for it is clear that the Argo appeared on the river when the show took place." Withington's hypothesis is not very convincing but has been generally accepted.

What is certain is that the Drapers' Company employed both dramatists on a separate rather than collaborative basis. Middleton and his partner Christmas were paid £150 for "making and setting out of the pageants and Shewes vizt the one in forme or liknes of a Mountayne one other a Charriott drawne with twoe Pellited Loyons a Third a Christall Temple and the fourth a royall Canopy of state and for all Chardges incident to those shewes" (p.335). Munday was paid £35 for "an Argoe." In addition there are payments to him for the hire of a barn to make the Argo in, to a drummer and fife for the Argo, to his men for drink, to his man "for bringing the bookes," and to his partner and himself in lieu of scarves (pp. 337-38). It is possible that the books mentioned here were, as Sheila Williams claims, the printed copies of The Triumphs of the Golden Fleece, but even assuming this to be so, I can see no grounds for her suggestion that Munday's contribution was therefore the authorized one. In all, Munday's Argo seems to have cost £41. 00. 06 which compares proportionately with the four Middleton-Christmas devices costing a total of £196. 00. 06.

The most likely explanation of the dual authorship seems to be that the Drapers wished to employ both Middleton and their brother Draper, Munday, but not, as in the past, in collaboration. Separate payment, production, and publication would have been a means of ensuring that the quarrels of the past (see pp.78-9) did not detract from "the service of the day." There would then be no need to postulate elaborate (and unlikely) theories of substitution. After all there is no reason why there should not have been two devices on the river--perhaps Middleton was unwilling to allow his rival all the glory of this. The lack of reference to each other's work in the printed text can be explained as a petulant desire on the part of both to refrain from giving credit where it was due. There is, however, a suggestion in Middleton's text that the Argo did join the procession; he refers to the Imperial Canopy being "accompanied with foure other Triumphall Pegmes [pageant structures]." Since he and Christmas devised only four tableaux altogether, this must either be a slip of the pen or include the Argo. The precise circumstances of the production of this Show cannot, of course, now be determined, but that Munday would have liked a greater share is perhaps implied in his dedication of "this poore pains of mine, which might have beene more had time so favourd" (sig. A2) to his brethren of the Company.
The combined pageants cost £196 or approximately 2/7 of the entire cost of the celebrations. The bulk of the money was raised in the usual way from entry fines and the payments of those Bachelors nominated to serve in the procession. Arrangements for financing commenced on 22 September 1623 when the Court of Assistants "ordered and soe thought fitt for the better easeinge of the chardge of the yeomandry...that there shalbee to the number of eight or tenne of the fittest and most sufficient persons of the yeomandry of this Company selected out and admitted by the Master warden of this Company into the Livery of the Company every of them payinge before hee bee admitted the accustomed fyne of xxvj 1/2 xiij 1/2 iiij 1/2 d" (p.331). It was further agreed that "if the fynes of those that are to bee admitted into the Livery the present stocke belonginge to the said yeomandry and the fynes and payments to bee raised by such as shall either fyne or serve in the same busines shall not suf­fice to performe the chardge of the said triumphes that then the some of Cxxvj 1/2 xiij 1/2 iiij 1/2 d...receaved upon the takeinge in of the last livory shalbee disbursed for the purpose aforesaid." In the event, twelve Bachelors were raised to the Livery, their entry fines amounting to £320. This was supplemented by £50 from the previous year's fines. A further £98. 10. 00 was raised from those Bachelors who refused to serve in the procession, while the forty-two who served in foynes contributed £112. 10. 00 and the thirty-three in budge £48. 10. 00. The Bachelors' recéipts thus totalled £639. 10. 00 of which £629. 09. 02 was disbursed. Further payments, amounting to £78. 12. 02, were made on behalf of the House by the Wardens and the Renter.
The same Court of Assistants meeting ordered that "the fower Master wardens shall take present course for the fittinge providinge and compound in so far as all things as shalbee fitt and necessarie for or towchinge the said showes and triumphes" (p.331). Whether they were responsible for the choice of Middleton and Christmas and Munday or whether they promptly delegated their responsibilities to the Wardens of the Bachelors is not known. The dedication of The Triumphs of the Golden Fleece to these last, rather than to the Lord Mayor, suggests that Munday may have owed his employment to them. Certainly it was the Wardens of the Bachelors, as was usual, who were responsible for the organization of the celebrations. It seems from their Accounts that, in keeping with the expense of this Show, the arrangements were slightly more lavish and the number of participants larger. Payments for caps and gowns and coats suggest that about one hundred and fifty poor men took part, accompanied by the seventy-five Bachelors in foynes and budge, and thirty-nine gentlemen ushers. A comparison of the Wardens Bachelors' Accounts for 1626 with those for this year suggests that the Company paid more for almost every aspect of the celebrations except food and meals. This unusually high cost, however, did not meet with the unanimous approval of those who had to pay; indeed the sanctions of the Lord Mayor had to be invoked to enforce payment from "divers obstinate Young men [who] refused to pay theire fines and bee Conformable to the chardge for the Lord Maiors Showes" (p.333).

Although, of course, the Accounts deal primarily with the organization of the procession, leaving the pageants largely to the care of authors and artificers, they do reveal some interesting points of procedure. One problem concerns where the tableaux were actually built. In 1621 Garret Christmas had hired a barn in Whitecross St. to make them in; in 1623 this (assuming it was the same one) is hired by Munday for the construction of his Argo, and Christmas is paid "for the hiring of boardes to make a place for the making of the Pageants in &c" (p.338). The Wardens Bachelors' Accounts also include the customary payments of 5/- to both Munday's and Christmas' men when the Wardens inspected their respective work (p.337, 342). However, the Wardens' Accounts for 1623-24 include a payment of 10/- "given in reward to the workemen of the Pageants against my Lord Maiors Day when the Company went to veiwe them at Leaden-hall" (p.332). It is difficult to know how to reconcile the two Accounts. Clearly, they relate to different occasions, the Wardens' payment being for when the Company, rather than just the Wardens Bachelors, viewed the pageants. Presumably then, the structures were transferred when they were all but complete to the Leadenhall, the traditional pageant making and storing place, where they were finally assembled and inspected. Alternatively, the boards hired by Christmas could have been used at the Leadenhall and only the Argo transferred there.

The Bachelors' Accounts also reveal that this year the "making of a Breakefast and fyer for the Children of the Pageants" fell to Middleton's lot (p.338). He was paid £3 for this unenviable task. It was a responsibility which was given in other years to the keeper of the Bell Inn at Carter Lane, conveniently close to St. Paul's or to the keeper of Blackwell Hall, conveniently close to the Guildhall. A further detail of pageant production to be gleaned from these Accounts concerns the provision of musicians for the devices. A drummer and a fife for the Argo were paid 7/6 and 12/- respectively whereas "a little boy a drumer in Middletons shewes" receives only 5/- (p. 338). There is no mention of music in either Middleton or Munday's texts, but this is true of all other pageant texts except those that include songs. Usually the writer and artificer undertook to provide music for the pageant, but it would seem that a Company might occasionally employ additional musicians.

The decision of the Company to spend more money than in previous years is reflected in the pageants themselves. Munday's Argo was clearly extremely elaborate, and two of the devices of The Triumphs of Integrity, the Crystal Temple of Integrity and the Imperial Canopy, are singled out by Middleton as manifesting "the Invention, & the Art of the Engineer." Middleton himself responds to the "Arte and Workmanship" of Christmas with a well-organized pageant designed to show the concomitant triumph of Virtue and those who cleave to her. The two men succeed particularly well in integrating structure and speech to present the "vertuous strife" demanded of all individuals, but especially of the Christian magistrate. According to Middleton's scheme, the Show begins with the Imperial Canopy, a tableau based on the Drapers' arms, which honours the new Lord Mayor on the Thames. This device is, of course, a particularly appropriate opening since it "specifies" for all to see the love that the Drapers bear thier brother Martin Lumley. The full description and exposition of this device, however, is reserved for its reappearance at the end of the Show; its double use suggesting the cyclical nature of time so often expounded in mayoral pageantry.
The first tableau on land, set up in St. Paul's churchyard, is a Mount Royal occupied by "certaine Kings and great Commanders, which Antient History produces, that were originally sprung from Shepheards, and humble beginnings." These "Honorable Worthies" are Viriat of Portugal, Arsaces of Parthia, Primislaus of Bohemia, Marcus Julius Lucinus, the Emperor Pertinax, and Tamburlaine, all of whom have, by their deserts, enobled "their meane Originals." As Joel H. Kaplan points out, these figures are not likely to have been as unfamiliar to the spectators as the editors of Malone Society Collections III suggest: Jack of Newberry in Deloney's tale keeps pictures of Viriat, Pertinax, and Primislaus as worthy examples for his servants to imitate, and Viriat, Primislaus, and Tamburlaine are used by Dekker in Old Fortunatus. 10 Middleton also refers to Pertinax, albeit as a type of parsimony, in A Game at Chess (VII, 122). The inclusion of Tamburlaine amongst those who "tooke their ascending / From the strong hand of Vertue," is particularly interesting for the contrast it presents to Marlowe's hero. 11 The use made of him here, however, is not unique in mayoral pageantry. In 1634 the Water Poet John Taylor wrote his sole Lord Mayor's Show, The Triumphs of Fame and Honour for the Clothworker, Robert Parkhurst. The fifth device is of Endimion on a ram's back who praises shepherds as "the noblest, ablest men." The two he singles out are Apollo who "kept Admetus sheep (tis said) / And Tamburlaine (whom Mighty Kings obey'd)." 12

The structure itself is one of the simpler ones in the Show, requiring only a mount and six kings; nonetheless, it is admirably suited to both the pastoral connotations of the tableau and the virtuous aspirations of its occupants. They are deliberately held up as exemplars for the spectators to note in the opening of the speech:

They that with Glory-enflamde hearts, desire
To see GreatWorth deservingly aspire,
Let e'm draw neere and fixe a serious Eye,
On this Tryumphant Mount of Royaltye.
(11. 59-62)

The lesson to be drawn is one which must have been pleasing to the citizen audience, low birth is no bar either to the exercise of virtue or to rising in the world. The application of the speech is reinforced by the association of the successful worthies with the Aldermen and the Lord Mayor as those on whom the favour of Vertue "hath reflected most and best."

The pastoral nature of the tableau has a dual function. First, it reminds us of the Drapers' sheep, the basis of their "Antient and Honorable Mistery,"; the shepherd kings are thus especially appropriate precedents for a Draper Lord Mayor. Second, it draws on the Christian implications of the good shepherd. The kings owe their rise to their virtuous deeds; this makes them worthy of admiration even though, as pagans, they cannot claim the "farre Holier Stile" of David "Who being King Annoynted, did not scorne / To be a Shepheard after." So as chief magistrate of London, Lumley must not only demonstrate the "vertuous Strife/That makes the compleate Christian," but also the care of shepherd for his sheep.

The application of this tableau to both the Lord Mayor and the spectators is made clearer still in the following one, the Chariot of Sacred Memory, which greets the Lord Mayor at the Little Conduit. In it are displayed those Draper worthies who have previously allied themselves with Virtue and so become "Famous for State and Government"; they include such well-known figures as Henry Fitz-Alwin, Francis Drake, and that citizen hero Simon Eyre. They are the London counterparts of the virtuous kings and commanders. The chariot itself is familiar from other Drapers' Shows; as usual it is "drawn" by two pellited lions, the supporters of the Company's arms. Mounted on these beasts are two figures bearing the banners of Lumley and the Company, thereby signifying the fusion of power and honour exemplified by the actions of eminent Drapers—the theme of Memory's speech.

Memory's insight into past men and their deeds makes it clear that the Draper worthies are to be equated with the shepherd kings. They too have "heapt up Vertues, long before they were old," and it is this alone that has made them particularly suited to hold high office. The speech extends the previous tableau's concentration on virtuous strife by considering the qualities necessary for the Compleate Magistrate. Lumley's year in office becomes the test of his worth: his task is difficult for he must strive against the materialism of this Age of Gold, but he has the advantage of his predecessors' "faire Examples, large and hie, / Patternes for us to build our Honors by." Assuming that he is succesful then Memory will revive in his "faire Deportment...the Antient Fame of all His Brothers Lives."

So far Middleton has presented us with shepherds who became kings and Drapers who achieved especial prominence by their virtuous actions. In the next device, the Crystal Sanctuary of Temple of Integrity, positioned "neere St. Lawrence-Lane," he concentrates on what he conceives to be the essential virtue of magistracy, integrity. This tableau is both thematically and structurally the centre-piece of the Show, "an unparaleld Maister-peece of Art." The body itself is an elaborate variation on the sanctuary/pavilion. The pillars are gold, the battlements silver, and the rest "crystal"; it probably bore some resemblance to the Palace of Apollo in Dekker's Londons Tempe (1629) whose appearance is preserved in the Booth sketches of that Show (p. 41). Inside sit Integrity and her "Sanctimonious Concomitants...transparently seene through the Crystall." Middleton explains that "more to expresse the Invention, & the Art of the Engineer, as also for Motion, Variety and the content of the Spectators, this Crystall Temple is made to open in many parts, at fit and convenient Times, and uppon occasion of the Speech."

This description raises certain problems of production: what was the crystal and how did the temple open and close? The Booth drawing suggests that the spectacular effects might have been achieved by curtains, presumably of white gauze. However, the praise that Middleton bestows upon Christmas, and the use of similar structures in the masque suggest: that this solution is probably too simple. For instance, the palace of Oberon (of which a Jones drawing exists), is described by Jonson as "a bright and glorious palace whose gates and walls were transparent."13 Stephen Orgel and Roy Strong suggest that this transparent effect may have afforded a "partial vision of Oberon and his court in tableau behind."14 The Crystal Temple opening to reveal Integrity and her concomitants is clearly a primitive relation of Jones' palace. It is therefore unfortunate that his drawing offers little help in determining the precise mechanics of his effect. Allardyce Nicoll argues that it was achieved by the use of flats made of calico and oiled paper similar to those which we know were used to create transparent clouds. Such a technique, however, is much better suited to an indoor banqueting-hall than to an outdoor procession. Nonetheless, Middleton draws our attention to the effect created for the "Night Triumph," that part of the procession which took place after dark when the Lord Mayor was escorted first to St. Paul's for evening service and then homeward. The Temple of Integrity was then "adorned and beautified with many lights, dispersing their glorious Radiances on all sides thorough the Cristall." Whatever the precise mechanics of the effect, the citizen spectators, as Middleton notes, regarded spectacle as an essential part of the Lord Mayor's Show and were doubtless as much impressed by Christmas' invention as courtiers were by Jones'.

The complex structure, however, functions as more than spectacle; it is the visual embodiment of the nature of Integrity herself, "one that is ever what she seems to be." So "manifest, perspicuous, plaine, and cleere is she that her thoughts can be immediately apprehended. In terms of the tableau itself these are her "Sanctimonious Concomitants," Equity, Truth, Love, Peace, and Meekness. The structure has, in addition, a further significance, for it is an allegorical representation of the Compleate Magistrate himself. As Integrity explains, "The Temple of an upright Magistrate/Is my faire Sanctuary, Throne and State." Lumley must therefore imitate her nature and actions, presenting such a clear front to the world that none will be able to doubt his motives:

As Thou art Eminent, so must they Acts
Be all Tralucent, and leave worthy Tracts
For future times to finde, thy very Brest
Transparent, like this Place wherein I rest:

(11. 227-230)

The conspicuousness of the office of Lord Mayor and the problems this entails is a frequent theme of Middleton's Shows. The Mayor's is an heroic task and his performance of it open to the scrutiny, and sometimes malicious detraction, of all. Hence the need for scrupulous Integrity who alone can ensure success and salvation.

Up to this point Middleton's scheme for The Triumphs of Integrity has involved a constantly narrowing focus on the virtues of government, culminating in Integrity's instructions to Lumley on the fulfilment of his trust. The final tableau, the Imperial Canopy, which awaited Lumley "Neere the entrance of woodstreet," takes a wider perspective and contemplates "the Fulnesse of all Blessings to this Land." As with the Temple of Integrity, the precise appearance of this device is not easy to determine. Middleton tells us that it was based on the Drapers' Company arms: "the three Imperiall Crownes cast into the Forme and Bignesse of a Triumphall Pageant, with Cloude and Sun-beames, those Beames by Enginous Art made often to mount and spred like a Golden and Glorious Canopy over the Deified persons"under it. These represent the Eight Beatitudes. In addition the King's motto, Beati Pacifici, is "set in faire great Letters, neare the uppermost of the three Crownes."

One possible solution to this problem is that the device could have resembled the Triple-Crowned Fountain of Justice in The Sunne in Aries where the three crowns appear to have formed a triple-tiered fountain. It is difficult, however, to reconcile this with the sunbeams that either mechanically, as the text indicates, or as a curtain "heavens" formed a canopy over the Beatitudes. It is more likely that the crowns, as depicted on the arms, were on top of this canopy. Study of the Booth sketches for Londons Tempe confirms the feasibility of this. They suggest that the basic structure of this type was a vaguely classical, canopied pavilion supported by pillars, with ample room on top of the "battlements" for extensive architectural embellishment or carved figures. This hypothesis is strengthened by both the plate of Faringdon's Tomb from Chrysanaleia (1616) and the Goldsmiths' plates from post-Restoration shows. Indeed these drawings show elaborate representations of coats of arms that form a "frontispice" to the device. Middleton explains that a frontispiece should function as "a remembrance of Honour," "reflecting" upon the King. And this "Royall Businesse," as is made clear in the speech, is precisely one significance of the Company's arms.

Certainly it is this coalescing of the interests of Company and kingdom that Middleton chooses to present in the device. Like Dekker and Heywood, he realizes that such solemnities as the Lord Mayor's Show can only be enjoyed under peaceful government. The Lord Mayor himself cannot provide this alone, for he is only the King's substitute. As in The Sunne in Aries, King James becomes the final precedent whose example the Lord Mayor is exhorted to follow. Hence the visual and verbal prominence given to Beati Pacifici. The unity of interest between King and Company is represented by the dual function of the Drapers' arms in the tableau. On the level of the Company, the three crowns signify the love, care, and cost that the Drapers have shown on this day towards their brother Lumley, but they also have a national significance, representing both the theological graces, Faith, Hope, and Charity and the three kingdoms that James rules. Without the King's maintenance of true religion, neither city nor kingdom can prosper. This is made explicit by the significance attached to the cloud and sunbeams of the Drapers' arms—the dissipation of the envious mist of Heresy by the "sun-beames of the Gospell." James is credited with this achievement, but its continuance is assured to "Succeeding Men" by the safe return of Prince Charles from Spain earlier in October.

The speech thus comments on the political and religious manoeuvrings of 1622-3, drawing, like A Game at Chess the following year, on the widespread fear of the Spanish match. Fortunately, however, good government, as exemplified by the "Royall Sute" of King, Prince, and Mayor, has prevailed, assuring the peaceful prosperity of England in general and the City in particular. In terms of the tableau itself, these blessings are symbolized by the "Deified persons," the Eight Beatitudes. The representation of the Beatitudes is not unique to this pageant; they also appeared in Elizabeth's Coronation Show where they were "applyed to our soveraigne Ladie Quene Elizabeth." Their use here is similar, for although they signify the blessed condition of England, Middleton again uses Beati Pacifici to emphasize the particular virtue of King James.
The speech is in fact remarkable for the praise it bestows on both James' policy of peace and its frustration by the failure of the negotiations for a Spanish alliance. Nonetheless, it provides an effective climax for The Triumphs of Integrity, drawing together Company, City, and kingdom in an expression of national rejoicing for the blessings of political and religious stability. The Show as a whole indicates how accurately Middleton could attune his City work to the demands of the citizens for whom he was writing. In contrast to his comedies which view the citizens' strivings for upward mobility satirically, his insistence here on the necessity of virtuous strife and the benefits that can accrue to the individual of humble origins who practises this is calculated to appeal to both the wider audience of Londoners and the immediate one of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and senior Drapers. This inclusiveness is designed to involve everyone, spectators as well as participants, in the communal experience, the celebration of both London and its inhabitants by the "State and Magnificence of that Pompe prepared to receive his Majesties Great Substitute into his Honorable charge."

Textual Introduction

The Triumphs of Integrity was printed by Nicholas Okes in late 1623, probably shortly after 29 October, the date of the Lord Mayor's Show. Like the Sunne in Aries and The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity, the pageant was not entered in the Stationers' Register and there is no record of payment for its printing in the Drapers' Company Accounts. for 1623. Middleton and his partner were again made responsible for all "Chardges incident to those shewes," a phrase which may have covered arranging the printing (p.335). In contrast to The Sunne in Aries, however, there is no evidence that an independent publisher was involved.
Ookes' association with mayoral shows began in 1612 with Dekker's Troia-Nova Triumphans; he was also responsible for the Middleton pageants of 1613, 1617, 1619, 1622, and 1626 (that is, all but The Sunne in Aries).
From 1622 his shop acquired a virtual monopoly on the printing of the shows. On the whole he produced satisfactory work; the texts are attractively laid out, and are relatively free of errors, although in some cases a high number of literals, turned letters, and other typographical infelicities remain. Few copies of most pageants are extant, so it is possible that these would have been corrected during printing. In 1623 (in especial contrast to 1626) Ookes' shop was extremely busy, producing at least eleven books including such substantial titles as Daniel's Works. With only one press, the shop must have been well-organized and efficiently run, although the heavy work load entailed shortages of type.

The pageant is in quarto, collating A-B⁴ C² (ten leaves). The contents are A1 title, A1v blank, A2 dedication, A2v blank, A3-C1v text, C2 blank. The speeches are in italic (reproduced in roman in this edition) and the prose descriptions in roman. Two copies of a probable minimum edition of five hundred are extant, preserved in the Henry E.
Huntington Library and the Pierpont Morgan Library. The Huntington copy has been cropped so that the catchword on A4v is missing; it also lacks the blank leaf C2. The title-page device and ornaments were all in frequent use in Okes' shop in the early 1620s.\footnote{22}

The pageant seems to have been printed by two skeleton formes.\footnote{23} The two running-titles on inner A are identical with those on C (A3\(^V\)=Cl\(^V\); A4=Cl), suggesting that the skeleton used for inner A also printed C by half-sheet imposition. Outer A seems to have been machined first, its single running title, The Triumphs (A4\(^V\)), appearing nowhere else in the text. A second skeleton may have been constructed for sheet B. The order of printing of this sheet, however, is obscured by press-variants in the running-titles: in the Morgan copy swash Is have been substituted on B1, B3, and B4. for the italic capital of Integrity. Since the title on B3\(^V\) is identical with that on B2\(^V\) and, allowing for a substituted I in The, that on B1 with B4, the same skeleton was clearly used to print both formes. It seems most likely that the Huntington copy was the prior state of outer B, the inner forme being machined first.\footnote{25} If this is so, then the title on B2 was originally set with a swash I and that on B4 with a non-swash I, this latter being changed during printing to the swash of the Morgan copy. The skeleton was then transferred to the outer forme and some copies, including the Morgan, printed with the swash I; however, before printing was complete both swash letters were pulled and non-swash capitals substituted. No attempt was made while the press was stopped to correct turned letters or wrong font type nor was the substantive error on B4 rectified. There also appear to be slight variations between the two copies in the position of the running-titles on B1\(^{V}\), B2\(^{V}\), B3, B3\(^{V}\), and B4\(^{V}\) and in the position of the signature on B2; presumably this occurred when the press was stopped and the formes unlocked.

The complexity of these changes on sheet B in a text as short as The Triumphs of Integrity (and one that needed to be printed quickly) demonstrates the dangers of over-simplifying printing-house procedures in this period. Given the workload in Okes' shop it seems at first surprising that the press should be stopped twice during the printing of a short work in a small edition to make such minor changes. However, this may be explained by supposing that the original substitution was done to improve the look of the text. From 1622 on, Okes prints almost all of the Lord Mayor's Shows and he may have felt it worthwhile to produce an attractive looking text for Middleton and the Drapers, but since he unfortunately was also very short of type, an urgent need for swash capitals elsewhere may have necessitated their removal and the substitution of the more common italic capital J.

The use of two formes and the printing of C by half-sheet imposition is consonant with Robert K. Turner, Jr.'s study of dramatic texts (excluding pageants) issued from Okes' shop from 1615-26.\(^{26}\) He also concludes that customarily copy was cast-off and that two compositors worked on a text, although they rarely set simultaneously. I have not found any clear evidence in The Triumphs of Integrity to suggest either cast-off copy or the presence of a second compositor. However, given the text's brevity, it is unlikely that the labour of casting-off would have been considered worthwhile. On the other hand the need to print it quickly might account for the use of two forms. Despite the work done by Turner and by John Russell Brown on Okes' compositors during this period, it has not proved possible to identify the compositor of Q with any studied by them.27

There are good grounds, however, for arguing that Q was set by the compositor responsible for Middleton's Show of the previous year, The Triumphs of Honor and Virtue. The consistency of spelling and punctuation preferences throughout the two pageants suggests that the same compositor set both texts. The significant variations between the two are a stronger preference in Honor and Virtue for -ie endings and absolute preferences for ancient (antient in Q) and -nesse. In Q, however, all but one of the instances of -nes occur in justified lines. Both texts show a constant preference for honor, city (pl. cities), triumph and a mixture of long and short spellings of he/he in etc. In addition the compositor of Honor uses beene in preference to bin-- the preferred form of the compositors studied by Brown and Turner. Q has one example of each. Such consistency is what one would expect given two similar works of much the same date, written by the same author and set by the same compositor, probably from holograph in both cases. At any rate, The Triumphs of Integrity was set by a compositor who had a copy of Honor and Virtue in front of him. The lay-out of title-page, dedication, head-title, and running-titles corresponds very closely. The only differences between the two title-pages are the same preference for -y endings found in the rest of Q rather than the -ie of Honor and Virtue and two variations in the use of italic type.
The printed text retains sufficient of Middleton's orthographical habits to allow the assumption that the compositor's copy was holograph. Contractions again provide the strongest evidence: Middleton's do's occurs twice (B2, B4) with no spelling variant or instance of doth. In contrast to The Sunne in Aries and The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity, ha's is not used, although there are four instances of hath (A3, A4, B4, B4). Sh'as, however, occurs on A4. E'm occurs on A4 and Cl with no examples of 'em or them; other dramatic works from Okes' shop use 'em. Other spellings which follow Middleton's known preferences are: honor (honour once in a justified line), toward, improove/proove, the five examples of the preterite in -cst, the retention of -d and -de in about one third of the instances of the voiced preterite and past participle, the retention of the digraph in praededing and caelestiall, and the long form of he/hee etc. in verse lines. Some of these (honor, for example) are likely to be the compositor's preference also. On the other hand, the compositor appears to have preferred the long form of the suffix -nes/nesse (confirmed by Honor and Virtue), setting this nine times and -nes five times. In 4/5 of these instances there was no room for -nesse. He also preferred upon to uppon and the short form of he/hee etc. (both confirmed by Honor and Virtue), although the latter cannot have been a strong preference since the long form occurs seven times in unjustified lines. Other distinct preferences which may be Middleton's as well as the compositor's are city and triumph; both of these are apparent in Honor and Virtue as well as Q, but not in The Sunne in Aries, or Health and Prosperity.
The punctuation of Q is most probably a sophisticated version of Middleton's. In contrast to The Sunne in Aries, its clarity is remarkable, despite heavy use of the comma. Either the copy was cleaner and better arranged or Okes' compositor more adept at dealing with the problems of light authorial punctuation. In Q, for instance, the prose descriptions are subdivided into paragraphs and sentences, rather than being printed, as in The Sunne in Aries, as one long sentence. The reliance on commas is typical of Middleton, even occurring in such short non-spoken directions as The Speech, in the Chariot. The colon is rarely used: ten times in the entire pageant.

The two extant copies of The Triumphs of Integrity, in the Huntington and Morgan Libraries, have been collated for this edition; the Huntington copy being used as copy-text. The pageant has been reprinted twice: in vol. V of Dyce's Works and in vol. VII of Bullen's. Bullen, however, had not seen a copy of it and so merely reproduces Dyce's text, but without always reprinting Dyce's information about his departure from Q.
TO

The Honor of him, to whom the Noble Fraternity of Drapers, his Worthy Brothers have Consecrated their Loves, in costly Triumphs; the Right Honorable, MARTIN LUMLEY, Lord Maior of this Renowned City.

Thy Descent Worthy, (Fortunes Early Grace) Sprung of an Antient, and most Generous Race Mac'ht with a Vertuous Lady; justly may Challenge the Honor of so Great a Day.

Faithfully devoted to the Worthines of you Both,

Tho. Middleton.
Of all Solemnities, by which the Happy inauguration of a Subject is celebrated, I find none that transcends the State and Magnificence of that Pompe prepared to receive his Majesties Great Substitute into his Honorable charge, (the City of London,) Dignified by the Title of the Kings Chamber Royall, which that it may now appeare no lesse hightned with Brotherly Affection, Cost, Art, or Invention, then some other praeceding Triumphs (by which of late times, the Cities Honor hath beene more faithfully illustrated) this takes its fit occasion to present it selfe.

And first to specificie the love of his Noble Fraternity after his Lordshippes returne from Westminster, having receivd some service uppon the water, by a proper and signifi cunt Maister-peece of Triumph, called the Imperiall Canopy, being the Antient Armes of the Company, an Invention neither old, nor enforst, the same Glorious and Apt Property, accompanied with four other Triumphall Pegmes, are in their convenient Stages planted to honor his Lordships progresse through the City; the first for the land, attending his most wished arivall in Pauls-Church-yard, which beares the inscription of a Mount Royall, on which Mount are plac't certaine Kings and great Commanders, which Antient History produces, that were originally sprung from Shepheards, and humble beginnings; onely the number of Six presented, some with Crownes, some with gilt Laurels, holding in their hands silver Sheephooks, viz. Viriat, a prime Commander of the Portugals, renowned amongst the Historians, especially the Romans, who in battailes of 14 yeares continuance, purchased many great and honorable victories; Arsaces King of the Parthians, who ordained the first Kingdome that ever was amongst them, and in the reverence of this Kings Name and memory, all others His Successors were called Arsacides after his Name, as the Roman Emperours tooke the Name of Cæsar, for the love of Great Cæsar Augustus; Also Marcus Julius Lucinus, Bohemiaes Primislaus, the Emperour Pertinax, the Great Victor Tamburlayne, Conqueror of Syria, Armenia, Babilon, Mesapotamia, Scythia, Albania, &c. Many Honorable Worthies more I could produce; By their deserts enobling their meane Originals. But for the better expression of the purpose in Hand, a Speaker lends a voyce to these following words!

The Speech in the Mount Royall.

They that with Glory-enflamde hearts, desire
To see Great Worth deservingly aspire,
Let e'm draw neere and fixe a serious Eye,
On this Tryumphant Mount of Royaltye;
Here they shall finde faire Vertue and her Name,
From low-obscure Beginnings raysde to Fame,
Like Light struck out of Darknes; the meane wombes
No more Eclipse brave Merit, then rich Toombes
Make the Soule happy; 'tis the Life, and Dying
Crownes both with Honors Sacred Satisfying;
And 'tis the Noblest Splendor upon Earth,
For man to adde a Glory to his Birth
(All his Lifes Race with honor'd Acts commixt)
Then to be Nobly-borne and there stand fixt;
As if 'twere Competent Vertue for whole Life
To be Begot a Lord; 'tis vertuous Strife
That makes the compleate Christian; not high Place,
As true Submission is the State of Grace,
"The Path to Blisse, lyes in the humblest Feild,
"Who ever rise to Heaven that never kneeld,
Although the Roofe hath Supernaturall Height,
Yet there's no Flesh can thither goe upright:
All this is instanc'st onely to commend,
The low condition whence these Kings descend;
I spare the * Prince of Prophets in this File,
And preserve him for a farre Holier Stile,
Who being King Annoynted, did not scorne
To be a Shepheard after; these were borne Shepheards, and rise to Kings, tooke their ascending
From the strong hand of Vertue, never ending Where Shee begins to rayse, untill shee place
Her Love-sicke Servants equall with her Grace;
And by this Dayes great Honor it appeares
Sh'as much prevaylde amongst the Reverend yeares
Of these Grave Senators, chiefe of the rest
Her Favour hath reflected most and best,
Upon that Sonne whom wee of Honor call,
And may't Successively reflect on all.

From this Mount Royall beautified with the Glory of deserving Aspirers, descend we to the Moderne use of this Antient and Honorable Mistery, and there we shall finde
the whole Livery of this most renowned and famous City, as upon this Day, and at all Solemne meetings, furnished by it; it clothes the Honorable Senators in their highest and richest Wearings, all Courts of Justice, Magistrates, and Judges of the Land.

By this time his Lordship and the Worthy Company being gracefully conducted toward the little Conduit in Cheape, there another part of the Triumph waytes his Honors happy approach, being a Chariot Artfully framde, and properly garnished; And on the Conspicuous part thereof is plac'st the Register of all Heroicke Acts and worthy Men, bearing the Title of Sacred Memory, who for the greater Fame of this Honorable Fraternity presents the Never-dying Names of many memorable and remarkable Worthies of this Antient Society, such as were then Famous for State and Government, Sir Henry Fitz-alwin Knight, who held the Seate of Magistracy in this City twenty foure yeares together, He sits figured under the Person of Government: Sir John Norman, the first Lord Maior rowed in Barge to Westminster with silver Oares at his owne cost and charges, under the person of Honor; the Valiant Sir Francis Drake, that rich Ornament to Memory, (who in two yeares and ten moneths space did cast a girdle about the world) under the person of Victory; Sir Simon Eyre, (who at his owne cost built Leaden Hall, a Granary for the Poore,) under the figure of Charity; Sir Richard Champion, and Sir John Milborne, under the person of Munificence or Bounty; Sir Richard Hardell, and Sir John Poultney, the one in the seate of Magistracy sixe yeares, the other foure yeares together, under the figures of Justice, and Piety, That Sir John being a Colledge-Founder, in the Parish of St. Lawrence Poultney, by Candle-wickstreete; & sic de caeteris.

This Chariot drawne by two pellited Lyons, being the proper Supporters of the Companies Armes, those two upon the Lyons.presenting Power and Honor, the one in a little Streamer or Banneret bearing the Lord Maiors Armes, the other the Companies.

The Speech, in the Chariot

I am all Memory, and me thinkes I see
Into the fardest Time, Act, Quality;
As cleere as if 'twere now begun agen,
The Natures, Dispositions, and the Men;
I finde to Godnesse they bent all their powers,
Which very Name makes blushing Times of ours;
They heapt up Vertues, long before they were old,
This Age sits laughing upon Heapes of Gold,
We by great Buildings strive to rayse our Names,
But they more truely wise built up their Fames,
Erected faire Examples, large and hie, Patternes for us to build our Honors by;
For instance onely Memory relates,
The Noblest of all City-Magistrates,
Famous Fitz-alwin, naming him alone,
I summe up twenty foure Lord Maiors in one,
For He by free election and consent
Fild all those yeares with vertuous Goverment; Custome and Time requiring now but one,
How ought that yeare to be well dwelt upon,
It should appeare an Abstract of that worth,
Which former Times in many yeares brought forth,
Through all the life of Man, this is the yeare,
Which many wish, and never can come neare, Thinke and give thanks; to whom this yeare do's come,
The Greatest Subject's made in Christendome;
This is the yeare for whom some long preparde,
And others have their glorious Fortune sharde,
But serious in thanksgiving, 'tis a yeare,
To which all Vertues like the people heere
Should throng and cleeve together, for the Place
Is a fit Match for the whole Stocke of Grace;
And as men gather wealth, 'gainst the Yeare comes,
So should they gather Goodnesse with their Summes,
For 'tis not showes, Pompe, nor a House of State
Curiously deckt, that makes a Magistrate,
'Tis his faire Noble soule, his Wisedome, Care,
His upright Justnes to the Oath he sware
Gives him compleate; when such a Man to mee, Spreads his Armes open, there my Pallace bee,
He's both an Honor to the Day so grac'st,
And to his Brother-hoods love that sees him plac'st,
And in his faire Department there revives,
The Antient Fame of all His Brothers Lives.

After this, for the full close of the Fore-noones Triumph, neere St. Lawrence-lane, his Lordship Receives an Entertainment from an unparaleld Maister-peece of Art, called the Cristall Sanctuary, stilde by the name of the Temple of Integrity, where her Immaculate selfe with all her glorious and Sanctimonious Concomitants sit transparently seen through the Crystall; and more to expresse the Inven­tion, & the Art of the Engineer, as also for Motion, Variety, and the content of the Spectators, this Crystall
Temple, is made to open in many parts, at fit and convenient Times, and uppon occasion of the Speech; the Columnnes or Pillars of this Cristall Sanctuary, are Gold, the Battlements Silver, the whole Fabrick for the Night Triumph adorned and beautified with many Lights, dispersing their glorious Radiances on all sides thorough the Cristall.

The Speech from the Sanctuary.

Have you a minde thicke Multitude to see
A Vertue, neere concernes Magistracy,
Here on my Temple throw your greedy eyes,
See me, and learne to know me, then y'are wise;
Looke, and looke through me, I no favour crave, Nor keepe I hid the Goodnesse you should have,
Tis all transparent what I thinke or do,
And with one looke your Eye may pierce me through,
There's no disguise, or hypocriticke vaile,
(Usde by adulterous Beauty set to sale)
Spread o're my actions, for respect or feare,
Onely a Cristall which approves me cleare;
Would you desire my Name? Integritie,
One that is ever what she seemes to be,
So manifest, perspicuous, plaine, and cleere
You may ee'n see my thoughts as they sit here,
I thinke upon faire Equity and Truth,
And there they sit crownde with eternall Youth,
I fixe my Cogitations upon Love,
Peace, Meeknes, and those thoughts come from above,
The Temple of an upright Magistrate,
Is my faire Sanctuary, Throne, and State;
And as I dare Detractions evillest Eye,
Sore at the sight of Goodnesse, to espie
Into my ways and actions, which lie ope
To every censure, arm'd with a strong Hope:
So of Your part ought nothing to be done,
But what the envious Eie might looke upon:
As Thou art Eminent, so must thy Acts
Be all Tralucent, and leave worthy Tracts
For future times to finde, thy very Brest
Transparent, like this Place wherein I rest:
Vaine doubtings; al thy Daies have bin so cleare Never came Nobler Hope to fill a yeare.

At the close of this Speech, this Cristall Temple of Integritie with all her cælestiaall Concomitants, and the other parts of Triumph take leave of his Lordship for that time, and rest from service til the great Feast be ended, after which the whole Body of the Triumph attends upon his Honor, both toward St. Paules, and homeward, his Lordship accompanied with the Grave and Honorable Senators of the City; amongst whom the two worthy Consulls, his Lordships Grave Assistants for the yeare, the worshipfull and Generous, Mr. Raph Freeman, and Mr. Thomas Moulson, Sheriffes and Aldermen, ought not to passe of my respect unremembred; whose Bounty and Noblenesse will proove best their owne Expressers.

Neere the entrance of woodstreete, that part of Triumph being planted to which the concluding Speech hath chiefly reference, and the rest, about the Crosse, I thought fit in this place to give this it's full Illustration; It being an Invention both glorious and proper to the Company, bearing the name of the thrice Royall Canopie of State, being the honored Armes of this Fraternity, the three Imperiall Crownes cast into the Forme and Bignesse of a Triumphall Pageant, with Cloude and Sun-beames, those Beames by Enginious Art made often to mount and spred like a Golden and Glorious Canopy over the Deified persons that are plac't under it, which are eight in number, figuring the eight Beatitudes, To improove which conceite, Beati Pacifici, being the Kings word or Motto, is set in faire great Letters, neare the uppermost of the three Crownes; and as in all great Edifices or Buildings, the Kings Armes is especially remembred, as a Honor to the Building and Builder in the Frontispice: so is it comely and requisite in these matters of Triumph framed for the Inauguration of his great Substitute, the Lord Maior of London, that some remembrance of Honour should reflect upon his Majesty, by whose peacefull Government under Heaven we enjoy the Solemnity!

The speech, having Reference to this Imperiall Canopy, being the Drapers Armes.

The Blessednesse, Peace, Honor, and Renowne, This Kingdome do's enjoy under the Crowne, Worne by that Royall Peace-maker, our King, (So oft preservde from Dangers menacing) Makes this Armes, (glorious in it selfe) outgoe All that Antiquity could ever showe, And thy Fraternity hath strivde t'appeare In all their course, worthy the Armes they beare, Thrice have They Crown'd their Goodnes this one Day With Love, with Care, with Cost; by which they may By their Deserts most justly these Armes claime, Got once by Worth, now Trebly held by Fame: Shall I bring Honor to a larger Feild, And show what Royall Businesse these Armes yeild? First the three Crownes affords a Divine scope, Set for the Graces, Charity, Faith, and Hope; Which Three the onely safe Combiners be, Of Kingdomes, Crownes, and every Company; Likewise with just propriety they may stand For those three Kingdomes swaide by the meek Hand Of Blest James; England, Scotland, Ireland;
The Cloud that swells beneath e'm, may imply
Some Envious Mist cast forth by Heresie, Which through his happy Raigne, and Heavens blest will,
The sun-beames of the Gospell strikes through still;
More to assure it to Succeeding Men,
We have the Crowne of Brittaines Hope agen, (Illustrious Charles our Prince,) which all will say,
Addes the chiefe Joy and Honor to this Day:
And as three Crownes, three Fruites of Brotherhood
By which all Loves Worth may be understood,
So threefold Honor makes the Royall Sute
In the King, Prince, and the Kings Substitute:

By th' eight Beatitudes, Yee understand
The Fulnesse of all Blessings to this Land,
More chiefly to this City, whose safe Peace
Good Angels guard, and Goodmens prayers encrease:
May all succeeding-Honor'd Brothers bee,
With as much Love brought Home, as Thine brings Thee.

For all the Proper Adornments of Arte and Workmanship in so short a Time so gracefully setting forth the Bodie of so Magnificént a Triumph the prayse comes as a just due to the Exquisit Deservings of Mr. Garret Crismas, whose faith-full performances still take the upper hand of his promises.

FINIS.
Press-variants in Q (1623)

Copies collated: CSmH (Henry E. Huntington Library), NNP (Pierpont Morgan Library).

Sheet B (inner forme)
Corrected: NNP
Uncorrected: CSmH
Sig. B4
   RT \textit{Integrity.} \textit{Integrity.}

Sheet B (outer forme)
Corrected: CSmH
Uncorrected: NNP
Sig. B1
   RT \textit{Integrity.} \textit{Integrity.}
Sig. B3
   RT \textit{Integrity.} \textit{Integrity.}
Substantive Changes

114 then] ed.; the Q, Dyce
258 which] Dyce; with Q
Emendations of Accidentals

29 service] service
57 following] followings
59-96] italic in Q
119 charges,] ~;
120 Honor;] ~,
123 Victory;] ~,
125 Charity;] ~,
126 Munificence] Munificenee
126 Bounty;] ~,
138-81] italic in Q
191 Temple] (Tem/ple); cw. ple
199-232] italic in Q
272-310] italic in Q
Critical Notes

8 Thy...Grace] Perhaps Middleton had forgotten this when he praised the lowly origins of the kings and commanders on the Mount Royal.

9 Race] Lumley's grandfather, Domenico Lomelin or Lomelili was a Genoese who settled in London and became a Gentleman of the Bedchamber to Henry VIII.

10 Lady] Lumley married twice: 1) Margaret Whithorne or Witham 2) Mary Symons. I have been unable to determine the dates of the marriages.

18-21 inauguration...London] Cf. Dekker, Britannias Honor (IV, 82), "More to Proclame his Greatnesse, what Vice-roy is install'd with louder popular acclamations? What Deputie to his Soveraigne goes along with such Triumphes?"

22 Kings...Royall] A common term for the capital city, signifying the harmony between it and the Crown.

23-26 no lesse...illustrated] The two previous pageants had been written by Middleton himself. Repeated in THP.

27 specifie] "To exhibit or show (a quality, etc.) to advantage or in a special manner." The OED cites no e.g. later than 1575 for this sense.

29-30 some service...Canopy] For the vexed question of the relationship between Munday's The Triumphs of the Golden Fleece and TI, see pp.174-76.
31-32 Invention...enforst] Middleton seems to be forestalling any charge of lack of originality in either the conception or making of the device. He and Christmas had used a variant on it in 1621, and while perhaps the inclusion of such a tableau was not "enforst," the Drapers undoubtedly expected that one part at least of the Show would focus on their history and traditions.

32 Property] Dyce and Bullen define respectively as "article" and "furniture" for the pageant. Clearly, however, the reference is not to a "prop" of any kind, but rather to the tableau as a whole. OED does not include this sense.

33 four] In addition to the Imperial Canopy, Middleton only describes the Mount Royal, the Chariot of Sacred Memory, and the Temple of Integrity. The missing tableau may be Munday's Argo.

33 Pegmes] pageant structures. OED, citing Jonson (H&S, VII, 90) "In the centre...of the Pegme, there was An Aback or Square, wherein this Elogie was written" and this e.g., defines as "movable stage or scaffold used in theatrical displays." From the Latin pegma.

37 Mount Royall] Middleton also used a Mount Royal for the Parliament of Honour in TLA (VII, 325).

39 Shepheards] especially appropriate in a Drapers' pageant.

41 Crownes...Laurels] The crowns are for the kings and the laurels for the commanders.
42 Viriat] or Viriathus; a shepherd who became a skilful guerilla leader in the Lusitanian rebellion against the Romans. Between c. 145 and 139 BC (when he was assassinated) he made himself master of the Iberian peninsula. He appears in Jack of Newberry's picture gallery in Deloney's tale, Works, ed. F. O. Mann (Oxford: Clarendon, 1912), pp. 40-42, and as one of Fortune's minions in Dekker's Old Fortunatus (I, 122).

43-44 Historians...Romans] Viriat's career is examined in Appian's history of the Roman conquest of Spain (based on non-extant material by Polybius); his origin as a shepherd is recorded by Pliny.

45 Arsaces] Of obscure origins he became the first king of Parthia c. 250 BC, and reigned two years before being assassinated.

51 Lucinus] There is no entry for anyone of this name in Prosopographia Imperii Romani Saeculi. It is possible that Middleton intended to refer to Valerius Licinianus Licinius, a Dacian peasant who became Augustus from AD 308-24. He was deposed and executed by Constantine.

51 Primislaus] Premysl the legendary founder of the Premyslid dynasty; originally a ploughman and later a noted law-giver. He appears in both Deloney and Old Fortunatus.

52 Pertinax] Supposedly the son of a weaver, he became a distinguished general under Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. With the support of the Praetorian Guard he succeeded Commodus on 1 January AD 193, but was assassinated on 28 March of that year. In A Game at Chess the Black Knight comments on "the parsimony of Pertinax, / Who had half-lettuces set up to serve again" (VII, 122). Another occupant of Jack of Newberry's gallery.

52 Tamburlayn] see J. H. Kaplan, "Middleton's Tamburlaine," English Language Notes, 13 (1976), 258-60. He is also used by John Taylor as an e.g. of an honourable shepherd in Taylors Pastorall (1624), sig. B3 and The Triumphs of Fame and Honour (1634), s'igs. B1^v-B2^v. Another of Fortune's minions in Old Fortunatus.

54 Honorable Worthies] The moral worth of most of these figures, despite their worldly success, seems questionable.

56-57 But...words] repeated in THP.

63 Name] "The name of a person or group of persons, with the implication of all the individuals bearing, or comprehended under, it; those having a certain name; hence family, clan, people" (OED, sense 4b). Hence all those united by Virtue.

65 Like...Darkness] Middleton's use of the opposition of light and darkness to reinforce the moral allegory is common to all his mayoral shows.
Similar images also occur in the plays, see WBW, II, ii, 425-8; The Changeling, III, iv, 14-17; V, i, 58-60.

83 File] "a catalogue, list, roll," obs. (OED, sense 3c).

85-86 Who...after] David for a time continued looking after his father's sheep after he had been annointed by Samuel (1 Samuel 17).
Directed at the speaker's immediate audience, the Aldermen and Lord Mayor.

A frequent designation of Middleton's for his patrons, cf. TT (VII, 236).

Middleton expresses this sentiment less politely in Michaelmas Term "you know 'tis term time, and Michaelmas term too, the drapers' harvest for foot-cloths, riding-suits, walking-suits, chamber-gowns, and hall gowns" (I, 254). Cf. Dekker's eulogy of furs in the Skinners' pageant Britannias Honor (IV, 90):

The reverend Judge, and all that climbe the trees Of Sacred Artes, ascend to their Degrees, And by the colours chang'd of Furres are knowne: What Dignity, each Corporation, Puts on by Furres...

suggesting that again an inscription was used to indicate the significance of the tableau.

See notes to SA, p. 156-7 for biographical details of Fitz-Alwin and the other worthies. Fitz-Alwin, Norman, and Eyre reappear figured by the same or similar virtues in the Chariot of Honor in THP.

The Grocers' worthies in THV are similarly described as "fair ornaments to memory" (VII, 363).

heraldic beasts granted to the Company in 1571.

Cf. THV (VII, 367) where Middleton deplores the worldliness of those who make "friends / Of Mammon's heaps, got by unrighteous ends"; Father Hubburd's Tale (VIII, 104) "The golden age that was is coin'd to gold."

162 Thinke...thanks] Cf. the admonishing of the Lord Mayor in THV (VII, 361) to "think and be thankful still."

172-73 House...deckt] The Companies generally contributed towards beautifying the Lord Mayor's house when one of their members held the office.

188-89 Invention...Engineer] Middleton praises both Christmas' conception of the structure and his execution of it.

194-85 Night Triumph] That part of the triumph which took place after dark, i.e. the procession to St. Paul's and to the Mayor's house. The speech marks the end of the morning's celebrations.

199 thicke Multitude] vocative; thick=crowded.

201 greedy] non-pejorative, "eager."

202-10 See me...cleare] Cf. Truth in TT who wears "on her breast a pure round crystal, showing the brightness of her thoughts and actions" (VII, 244). Zeal explains that "by that crystal mirror at her breast;/ The clearness of her conscience is exprest."

208 adulterous...sale] combining comment on Beauty's lack of purity as well as her essentially spurious, counterfeit nature.

208 set to sale] put up for sale.
209 respect] probably pejorative, "discrimination, partiality, or favour in regard of persons or things" (OED).

219 Temple] punning on the bodily and spiritual meanings of temple. The Temple of Integrity is an allegorical representation of the "upright Magistrate," see 11. 227-30.

221 Detractions] Middleton frequently warns the magistrate against the envious spite of others. Cf. "the Gusts of Envie, Billowes:of despight" to be negotiated by the Lord Mayor in SA, 1. 65 and the "Detraction to Peace" of The Peacemaker (VIII, 327-334). As early as 1598 Middleton prefixed to Micro-cynicon "His Defiance to Envy" (VIII, 114).

225 Your] referring now to the magistrate not the multitude.

226 envious Eie] Detraction's.

228 Tracts] combining the senses of both track and the modern tract.

242 Freeman] a Clothworker; Alderman of Bishopsgate 1622-32 and of Cornhill 1632-34; Sheriff 1623-24; Lord Mayor 1633-34; died 1634 while in office. A leading member of the Levant Co.

242 Moulson] one of a family of London merchants, brother-in-law to Nicholas Rainton; Alderman of Queenhithe 1623-27 and of Broad St. 1627-38; Sheriff 1623-24; Lord Mayor 1634 after Freeman's death; knighted 1634. He was a leading member of the Merchant Adventurers and was M.P. for London 1628-29.

247 planted] "Set up" during the ceremony at St. Paul's.

249 Illustration] explanation.

251 Royall Canopie] i.e. the Imperial Canopy of the water show. The three crowns originally signified the Imperial crowns of the Virgin. However, when the Company obtained a fresh coat-of-arms in 1613 William Seger, Garter King of Arms, "corrected" them, giving them arches as in royal crowns. Hence the "Royall Businesse" implied by them.

253 Forme and Bignesse] see p.186.

255 Enginious] probably combining both senses in OED 1) clever, ingenious 2) partaking of the nature of an engine. The canopy may resemble the "bright-spreading canopy, stuck thick with stars, and beams of gold shooting forth round about it" of TT (VII, 252).

258 eight Beatitudes] Middleton alludes to these the previous year in the Globe of Honor in THV. They also appeared in Elizabeth's Coronation show.

263 Frontispice] usually applied to either "the decorated entrance of a building" or "the pediment over a door, gate, etc." Middleton probably also intends the now obsolete sense of "the summit of a building" (OED). The Drapers' arms are the summit of this tableau.

267-68 peacefull...Solemnity] Cf. Dekker, T-NT (III, 230), "Tryumphes, are the most choice and daintiest fruit that spring from Peace and Abundance." The same theme is sounded in Heywood's Londini Status Pacatus (1639).

280-81 Thrice...Cost] i.e. corresponding to the three crowns. Similarly, Deserts, Worth, and Fame in the next two lines.

284 Field] glancing at the heraldic sense, the surface on which the charge is depicted.

287-89 Graces...Company] the three theological virtues. The triple crowns also represent them. In THP Middleton uses the four Cardinal Virtues in a similar way as the foundation of all institutions.

292 Blest] for his peace-making and his meekness.

293-300] The cloud is an adumbrated version of the mist of Error in IT. A reference to fears of Catholic domination if Prince Charles had married the Infanta. His safe return from Spain earlier in October had been greeted by wild rejoicing.

303 Royall Sute] The analogy is from cards; a royale is to hold King, Queen, and Jack of the same suit.

312 so...Time] no exaggeration; the Company started preparations on 22 Sept.
NOTES

1 Biographical details are drawn from Beaven, II, 53, 177; Cokayne, pp. 97-8; and Johnson, IV, 418, 449.

2 A. L. Rowse, Sex and Society in Shakespeare's England (New York: Scribner, 1971), pp. 182-3. 1595 is the most likely date; the sense of this passage in Rowse is confused—he refers only to July. This would make Lumley only about fifteen; however, the reference cannot be to his father because James Lumley died in 1592. Munday claims in his 1633 continuation of Stow's Survey that Watling St. was favoured by Drapers.

3 In the 17th century it seems to have been increasingly common for a Draper Lord Mayor to serve as Master of the Company at the same time. In the case of Lumley, Abbot, and Garway, it was their second term as Master.

4 Johnson, IV, 96, gives a figure of £707. 18. 10, but he does not include all the minor expenses from the Wardens' and the Renter's Accounts. The Renter was the official in charge of rents from Company property.

5 "The LMS for 1623," PMLA, 30 (1915), 110-16. There is no evidence that II was printed before 29 Oct., see p. 310.

6 Bentley, IV, 926, apparently accepts Withington's contention; Bergeron, Civic Pageantry, pp. 161, 193 and "Anthony Munday: Pageant Poet to the City of London," Huntington Library Quarterly, 30 (1967), 366-367, refers only to the "collaborative" effort of 1623.

7 S. Williams, "The LMS from Peele to Settle," p. 142. In view of the Drapers' expenditure on Middleton and Christmas' share of the Show and the briefness of Munday's contribution, this seems exceedingly unlikely. If the reference is to Munday's text this would be the first certain instance of printing taking place before the show. It is equally possible, however, that the "books" were Munday's accounts.

8 In 1621 71 Bachelors participated, together with about 130 poor men, and perhaps 44 gentlemen ushers. The 1626 procession was on a slightly smaller scale.

9 Again, there is no evidence as to who the children were or whether they were the only participants.

Kaplan, pp. 258-60.

The Triumphs of Fame and Honour (London, 1634), sigs. B1v-B2v. The sentiments of the speech seem to have been drawn from an earlier work of Taylor's, Taylor's Pastoral (London, 1624) sigs. B1, B3 where Apollo and Tamburlaine are featured as honourable pagan shepherds (the pamphlet also praises recent Draper Lord Mayors), see S. Williams, "A LMS by John Taylor the Water Poet," Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, 41 (1959), 527-28.

H&S VII, 346.

Lighting was also important in Oberon, see Orgel and Strong, I, 206.

The emphasis on citizen virtues varies from pageant to pageant of Middleton's, cf. the stress on industry in THI. He is always more subtle, however, than Taylor who, in The Triumphs of Fame and Honour, sig. A8, urges the apprentices: "Worke on my Lads, and you in time may be, / Good members of this Honour'd Company."

In drawing the following conclusions, I am indebted to J. H. Kaplan for measuring and analysing the rts on the Huntington copy.
It is possible that a different skeleton was used to print outer A, although in this case one might expect the sole rt to reappear in one forme of sheet B.

The alternatives involve stopping the press three times during the printing of the two formes or, assuming that the Huntington outer B was the prior state and went through the press first, the substitution of the more common non-swash Is, followed by the replacement of only one of them. This seems less likely.

THE TRIUMPHS OF Health and Prosperity.

A Noble Solemnity performed through the City, at the sole Cost and Charges of the Hoorable Fraternity of DRAPERS, at the Inauguration of their most Worthy Brother, The Right Honorable CUTHBERT HACKET, Lord Major of the Famous City of LONDON.

BY THO. MIDDLETON GENI.
Critical Introduction

The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity celebrated the inauguration in 1626 of the sixth Draper Lord Mayor in twelve years, Cuthbert Hacket. In fact, Hacket had been a member of the Dyers' Company until 1626 but was then translated to the Drapers' Company in accordance with City custom so that he might serve as Lord Mayor. Little is known of his career; he was Alderman of Portsoken from 1616-24 and of Bridge from 1624 until his death in 1631. In marked contrast to their reluctance over Edward Barkham, the Drapers apparently accepted him without demur. He was listed as an Assistant in the Minutes for 1625-26 and, like Martin Lumley in 1623, was Master of the Company during his mayoralty. Since the Master's year of office began in August he was therefore in a position to influence the preparations made for his triumph.

These preparations parallel those for Martin Lumley's inauguration in 1623. On September 20 1626 the Court of Assistants consider the financial provisions for "the better ease of the yonge men of this Company in their chardge towards those Showes." It orders the raising of six to eight Bachelors, over and above their Wardens, to the Livery at the accustomed rate of forty marks (£26. 13. 04.) and empowers the Company's Wardens "in the meane tyme" to "provyde to make such Showes and tryumphes as the tyme and occasion will require." Three weeks later, however, on October 13 the Assistants decide that it will be necessary to admit ten men to the Livery. Should the £266. 13. 04 raised by this means, in conjunction with the fines "for and aboute the service" be insufficient, then the balance shall be "supplyed had and disbursed out of this Companyes moneys by the Rentor warden or the Rentor" (p.346). In fact, the remaining £284. 12. 06 was obtained in the usual way by nominating fifty-four Bachelors to serve in foynes and fifty-two in budge at a fixed rate, and fining those who refused to participate.

Unfortunately, none of the information available tells us who was responsible for choosing Middleton and Christmas to prepare the Show, or even whether, as in 1621, the committees scrutinized several applications before making their choice. If the Company determined on Middleton and Christmas on the basis of their satisfactory performance in 1621 and 1623 they were to be sadly disappointed this time. The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity is one of the few pageants where the Company involved was sufficiently discontented with the result of the writer's and artificer's labours to deny them complete payment. On 31 December 1626, the Minutes of the Court of Assistants note "Mr Middleton and Mr Christmas referred to the Wardens for their demandes touchinge the pageantes/ Item the paymente of Mr Middleton and Mr Christmas for the Pageantes and of others for the fireworkes and providinge of Chambers beinge hetherto putt of in regarde of the ill performance thereof is nowe referred to the wardens Batchelors of this Company whoe are willinge to compound and agree with the parties the best they may giving them contentemente as the busines shall deserve and as shalbe fitt the credit of this Company." (p.346). The result of this negotiation can be seen in the Wardens' Bachelors' Accounts. The Bachelors' year ran from Michaelmas to Michaelmas and so the figures in the 1626/7 account for Hacket's triumph must be those finally agreed upon. Middleton and Christmas receive £125 for four devices whereas they had received £140 in 1621 and £150 in 1623. Similarly Richard Jones is paid £8 for greenmen and fireworks, although John Walker had been paid £8.10.00 for the same services in 1623. Jones also provides 140 chambers for £31 whereas his predecessor had supplied 120 for £35. One reason for these lower figures is the Company's dissatisfaction with the work.

R. C. Bald has coupled the Drapers' disappointment with this pageant to the City's reluctance to pay Middleton and Christmas for their work on the abandoned Coronation Show for Charles I of 1625-6. He suggests that "the two charges, coming so close together, seem to point to some sort of peculation; whether Middleton and Christmas, having control of the expenditure of the money, spent as little as possible so that there would be the more left over for them, or whether they entered into a profit-sharing agreement with the contractors cannot, of course, be known." While this interpretation is possible, it is not necessary to conclude that Middleton and Christmas were guilty of fraud in either or both instances. The case for the Coronation show rests on two entries in the City Repertories: in January 1626 the Court of Aldermen "upon information given unto this Court by the maister and wardens of the company of Paynter-stayners London...of abuses and badd workmanship in and about the contrivings and payntings of the Pagents" order certain senior Aldermen, including Barkham, Lumley, and Hacket, and certain Painter-stainers to "vēwe the Pagents also the Crosse in Cheape, and the work done in the Exchange, and sufficientlie to informe themselves of the abuses any waie comitted in and aboute the workmanshipp thereof." Unfortunately we do not know what these men decided, but it is unlikely that Hacket and the other two Draper Assistants would have been willing to employ the two later in the year had they been seriously delinquent. Since, however, the charges were made by the Painter-stainers (who, on account of their expertise, were customarily made responsible for overseeing the workmanship of the Royal Entry), it seems improbable that they were completely unfounded. In any case, whatever dissatisfaction there was seems aimed primarily at Christmas and his workmen rather than Middleton.

The second entry is from June 1626; the Aldermen, considering the money already paid to Christmas for the Coronation show for "the fynishing of the three pageants, and for the performance of the shewes" thought "fitt and soe ordered the said Mr.Christmas and Mr Middleton referring themselves unto this Court, that noe further moneys shalbe paid unto either of them, but that Mr Christmas shall forthwith cause the said Pagents to bee taken downe, and to have the same for his full satis-faccion." Later that month the Aldermen authorize the payment of £100 "over and above what alreadie hee hath received out of the Chamber of London in full sattisfaccion and demande for the settinge upp of three pageants." The important point here is that these entries refer to decisions made after the King's order to cease preparations and pull down the pageants already set up had been received (on 26 May). Naturally, the Aldermen were, from this point on, anxious to minimize any further unnecessary expenditure, and it is probably on this account rather than from any dissatisfaction with the work that the Court ordered a stop in payment. In the end, Christmas at least, having received the three pageants, £100, and whatever had previously been disbursed, cannot have done too badly. The evidence of the Coronation show suggests that there may well have been some bad workmanship, but that ultimately the City did not seem to have been dissatisfied with the performance of the partners.

In the case of The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity the complaints clearly centre on its "ill performance." Since the Assistants include the provider of fireworks and chambers, Richard Jones, in their censure, it seems that their discontent was directed primarily at what happened on the day itself, rather than at the conception of the Show or the workmanship involved. This would square with the control exercised by the Wardens Bachelors over the entire proceedings; it is doubtful that they would have tolerated shoddy work. But, as Munday's experience in 1609 shows, many things could go wrong during the performance, and such lapses were viewed sourly by the Company when it came to settle accounts.

Having said this to rescue Middleton from Bald's charge of peculation, it cannot be denied that The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity is his worst pageant. The occasion itself offered an unusual opportunity to depart from the customary sentiments and express the City's rejoicing at the accession of a new monarch, the abatement of the plague, and the restoration of plenty, but the Show fails to live up to the promise of its title. If Bald is wrong in imputing dishonesty to Middleton, he is certainly right in commenting on the loss of enthusiasm apparent in the text. This is especially demonstrated in Middleton's reliance on previous work in the genre. He does manage some originality in the speeches, although two of these, the speech of Governement from the Chariot of Honor and the final one, have no intrinsic connection with their physical settings. However, the prose descriptions are almost completely cobbled up from previous pageants. The potential of the first tableau is dissipated by lack of organization in the remainder of the text, and the final tableau is not even described; Middleton perfunctorily informs us in passing that the Fragrant Garden of England takes its farewell of the Lord Mayor "accompanied with the Fountayne of Vertue, being the fourth part of the Tryumph." In addition the pageant is conspicuous for its brevity—running to a mere 230 lines. Had the Drapers chosen to take issue with Middleton for the carelessness of his writing they would surely have been justified.

Nevertheless, the reasons behind the unsatisfactory performance may reflect on the Company as well as on Middleton, Christmas, and Jones. The celebrations for Lord Mayor Hacket cost a mere £545. 13. 08, making it one of the two cheapest Lord Mayor's Shows in the period 1610-39. Its low cost is presumably in part a result of re-negotiating the payments to Middleton, Christmas, and Jones, but a comparison of the Bachelor's Accounts of 1623 for Martin Lumley's triumph with those of 1626 shows that wherever possible the Company paid less for the same or only slightly reduced services. Thus in 1626 Tilbury Strange is paid £18 for the gallyfoist, compared to £23 in 1623. Similarly the cost of the thirteen cloths for making poor men's gowns and coats is down from £108. 10. 00 to £106. Other economies are in the making of the gowns, the Under-Marshall's fee, and the reduced number of musicians. In addition, the lack of any elaborate mechanical devices in the pageant such as those Christmas and Middleton provided for The Triumphs of Integrity indicates the Company's unwillingness to pay for them. Certainly it seems that where possible the Company drove a harder bargain than in the past; under such conditions it would not be surprising if it did not get such good service.

This attempt to economize, which must have been sanctioned by Hacket as Master of the Company, can be explained by two factors. First, 1625 had been an especially bad year for the City, approximately one sixth of its population died of the plague, and the unusually wet spring and summer produced a disastrous harvest with attendant famine and poverty; this further depressed trade, never very healthy throughout the 1620s. Under such conditions it is not surprising that the Company wished to cut back on expenses. Furthermore, the Bachelors had been required to pay out an unusually large amount over the preceding twelve years for the triumphs of their brethren, and it seems likely that Hacket and the Assistants would thus endeavour to forestall any discontent among the depleted ranks of the Bachelors on whom the burden of costs fell. These circumstances are reflected in the reduction of the number of poor men to about one hundred and twenty and the other economies.
The pageant itself starts well; even if he has used it before, Middleton's declaration that "there is no Subject upon earth received into the place of his Governement with the like State and Magnificence" effectively draws on the Londoner's response to the pre-eminence of his city. And this is especially appropriate since the City, as Middleton explains in the first speech, is now restored to fruitfulness and plenty after its recent tribulations. The opening tableau, in the form of a Beautiful Hill or Fragrant Garden complete with flowers, fruit, lambs, sheep, and a rainbow, represents London, the "most pleasant garden of England." Glynne Wickham includes this structure in his discussion of the arbour, but while as a garden it obviously has close affinities with this, it is essentially yet another variation on Middleton's favourite device, the mount. As with so many of the pageant structures, there is a two-level playing area, the raised "platforme" or Hill and the bed of the wagon. On the Hill itself is a variety of symbolic flowers and fruits, presumably similar to the ones "most artificially molded to the life" in the Hortus Euporiae arch of James I's Coronation show, and, arched above it, is the rainbow, symbol of God's mercy. On the lower level are the lambs and sheep, the woolly creatures that "graze on the Beautie" of the tableau. It is elucidated by an unnamed speaker; the frequency of such unidentified spokesmen in this Show being perhaps another instance of Middleton's lack of interest. Despite this, the close relationship of speech to structure makes it the most successful of the entire Show.

The calamities of 1625 and early 1626 were followed by the abatement of the plague and an unusually good harvest, so that by August the City was able to celebrate a service of thanksgiving for the restoration of plenty. It is against this background of disaster followed by renewed prosperity that Middleton sets his tableau. The use of the garden to represent the flourishing of the city or nation is, of course, common in European pageantry, and Middleton combines this aspect of the tableau with the Drapers' own iconography to reinforce his point. The Drapers' sheep are not only the basis of the wealth of that Company, but of the entire kingdom. Even in London, centre of diversified trade that it was, 3/4 to 9/10 of exports were derived in some way from wool. Its symbolic value is stressed by Middleton immediately before the speech: "this renowned and famous City furnished by it, it clothes the honorable Senators in their highest and chiefest wearing, all Courts of Justice, Magistrates and Judges of the Land." The society of Drapers becomes a microcosm of the wider society; the flowers and fruits decorating the tableau represent "the sweete odors of their Vertue and Goodnesses, and the fruites of their workes of Justice and Charity, which have bene both Honorable Brothers and bounteous benefactors of this antient Fraternity."

Middleton is able to use the implications of the images of garden and rainbow to combine both an allegorical and a more literal presentation of the City's situation. On one level the speech celebrates the cessation of the storms which have flooded the garden and destroyed its prosperity:

The Garden springs agen, the Violet Beds,
The lofty Flowers beare up their fragrant heads;
Fruit over-lade their Trees, Barnes cracke with store.
(11. 76-78)
This reflects the actual situation of 1625 and 1626, but, of course, the storm has a significance beyond the merely climatological. The "Cloude of griefe" becomes the plague which has hung over the City, symbol of the wrath of God; its dissipation, signified by the covenant of the rainbow, marks the return of London to God's grace, and this in turn is manifested allegorically by the abundance of fruit and flowers. And, as the anonymous speaker points out, what better way for the City to celebrate this than when "like Jems unvalued her best joyes she weares," she honours her chief citizen in a public festival which reminds all men of their responsibilities to others?

what's requir'd?
That which in conscience ought to be desir'd;
Care and Uprightnesse in the Magistrates place,
And in all men Obedience, Truth and Grace.

(11. 82-86)

This alone will ensure the City's continuing well-being, both material and spiritual.

The second tableau, the Sanctuary of Prosperity, focuses more closely on the duties of the magistrate. This is an arched structure, built on pillars, probably closely resembling the Pallace of Apollo in Dekker's Londons Tempe (1629), for which a sketch by Abram Booth survives. Its physical shape symbolizes the virtues necessary to society: "the foure faire Corinthian Columnes or Pillars, imply the foure principall Vertues Wisedome, Justice, Fortitude, Temperence, the especiall upholders of Kingdomes, Cities and Honorable Societies." Again Middleton uses the Drapers' Company as a microcosm of the city and the kingdom. The
The manifestation of prosperity that hangs on the top arch of the Sanctuary is the Golden Fleece, crest of the Drapers and symbol of English wealth. The two exemplars used by the speaker to instruct the Lord Mayor, Jason and his English incarnation Sir Francis Drake, are both closely associated with the Company. Like them, the Mayor is embarking on a perilous voyage in search of the Fleece, in his case the Fleece of Fame. On the sea of the world, however, the physical dangers of rocks, gulfs, and quicksands faced by Jason and Drake, have become "malice, spite, / Envy, Detraction of all Noble Right." These moral perils can only be safely navigated by "th' Compasse of a Vertuous name." The tableau thus effectively follows from the preceding one by emphasizing the magistrate's role in the maintenance of prosperity. His virtue becomes a mainstay of society and, in reward for his successful practise of it, he will attain the Fleece of Fame. At the same time, Middleton, by his choice of precedents, contrives to honour the Company to which Hacket belongs.

From this point on, however, the coherence of the pageant deteriorates. "More to encourage the Noble endeavours of the Magistrate," the Lord Mayor is conducted to the third device, the Chariot of Honor, which had previously done service as the water show. Unfortunately, the physical structure of the device has been lifted directly from the Chariot of Sacred Memory in the previous Show by Middleton and Christmas for the Drapers' Company, The Triumphs of Integrity. Like that Chariot, this one is drawn by Power and Honor seated on the two pellited lions, supporters of the Company's arms, and contains Virtues representing the usual crop of Drapers' worthies. In this case, however, only the three most important, Fitz-Alwin, John Norman, and Simon Eyre merit description, the rest being dismissed with an Et sic de cæteris. The chariot itself is one with hierarchical seating, the "most Eminent seate" being given to Governement, "the proper Vertue by which we rayse the noble memory of Sir Henry Fitz-Alwin, who held the Seate of Magistracy in this City twenty foure yeares together."

Although this is the only speech in the pageant with an identified speaker, it has virtually nothing to do with the tableau itself. If Middleton really intended it to raise the noble memories of worthy Drapers, then it must be accounted a failure. The speech, a disquisition on the responsibilities of various parts of the body politic (each symbolized in good conventional fashion by the appropriate part of the human body), concentrating on the duties of London, the heart of the kingdom, is suitable for a figure named Governement, but not, even allowing for its appropriateness to Fitz-Alwin, to Governement in that particular setting. Having outlined the function of sovereign, Privy Council, temporal and spiritual lawgivers, and soldiers in terms of head, eyes, lips, and arms, Middleton devotes the rest of the speech to the City, situated "ith' middle of the Land / It ha's as in the body the Heartes place...The place where now you are." As the heart is the fountain of the body's life, so London is the fount of Affection, Duty, and Zeal. These qualities she has always shown to the King and, in accordance with her role, has taught them to "all Cities through the Common-weale." The love of the City for its chief citizen and, through him, the King whose substitute he is, is demonstrated in miniature by the Drapers' readiness to provide this triumph for Hacket. All this is quite appropriate to a Lord Mayor's Show, but Middleton makes no attempt to give the speech any relevance to the worthies in the Chariot.

The final tableau takes place "Betweene the Crosse and the entrance of Woodstreet" and is a joint one: the Garden of England with its rainbow joins the "fourth part of the Triumph," the Fountain of Vertue. Since Middleton neither troubles to describe it, nor makes any reference to it in the concluding speech, there is no way of knowing how it fitted into the scheme of the pageant as a whole. One possibility, which of necessity can only be speculative, is that it was similar to the Fountain of Justice, the last device of The Sunne in Aries. This fountain was "triple-crowned" with the charges of the Drapers' arms, and peopled by Justice, Wisdom, Truth, and a variety of other Graces and Virtues suitable to high office. Something of this sort that would again link the Lord Mayor to his Company may have been used here. Whatever it was, it clearly did not engage Middleton's interest. The speech itself applies the moral of the rainbow to Cuthbert Hacket. His year, like the pageant itself, must both begin and end with Mercy, God's covenant to Man. If he so tempers Power with Mercy, following the example of his Draper predecessors, then the springing again of the City, the Garden of England, will reflect upon him; his year in office will be "vertues harvest time... a time given / To treasure up good Actions fit for Heaven."

Middleton makes some effort in this speech to link the tableaux together again; nonetheless it is impossible not to suspect that the references to the harvest are more fortuitous than deliberate. The pageant suffers in comparison with his other Drapers' Shows in two respects in particular. In contrast to The Sunne in Aries, The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity lacks a strong central image which can unify the disparate elements and, in contrast to The Triumphs of Integrity, there is little evidence (with the exception, I think, of the first tableau) that Middleton was much stimulated to produce imaginative speeches. There is nothing in this pageant, presumably because of the straitened financial circumstances with which Middleton and Christmas had to contend, that corresponds to the Crystal Sanctuary in The Triumphs of Integrity or the Globe of Honor in The Triumphs of Honor and Vertue (1624). In fact, the evidence points to a considerable failure of imagination on the part of both men. We can adduce, in addition, Middleton's lifting of linking material from earlier Shows as an indication of this. Admittedly this would not be apparent during the performance, and so has no bearing on the reasons for the Drapers' dissatisfaction, but, in conjunction with the limitations of the speeches, the unusual unoriginality of the Chariot of Honor, the bad organization, and the presumed incompetence in making arrangements for the day itself, it suggests that in this particular instance the "Inquisitive Man" of Middleton's introduction might have had second thoughts about the unique magnificence of the celebrations.

Textual Introduction

The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity was printed by Nicholas Okes in 1626, probably shortly after 29 October, the date of its performance. As is the case with Middleton's other pageants for the Drapers' Company, there is no entry for it in the Stationers' Register, nor record of payment for its printing in the Drapers' Accounts. As in previous years, however, Middleton and his partner were made responsible for "all chardges incident to theis shewes" and this may have included the printing costs (p.348). 1626 was a slack year for the Okes' shop; Morrison lists only a reprint of Thomas Trussel's The Souldier Pleading his own Cause in addition to Q.¹⁴ Neither are very long books.

The pageant is in quarto, collating A-B⁴. The contents are A¹ title with a woodcut of the Drapers' Company arms, A¹ blank, A2 dedication, A² blank, A³-B⁴ text, B⁴ blank. The speeches are printed in italic (reproduced in roman in this edition) and the prose descriptions in roman.

Two copies of a probable minimum edition of five hundred remain, one in the Guildhall Library, London and the other in the Henry E. Huntington Library. The Guildhall copy has been laid down, the lower parts of some pages have been torn or damaged and corrections (sometimes inaccurate) have been made in ink (especially sigs. A³, A³⁴, A⁴, B¹, B¹⁴, B²). This copy lacks a in 1. 50 (A³⁴) and of in 1. 138 (B¹⁴); in addition, on B³ it wrongly substitutes semi-colons for the colons after Right (1. 117) and Shore (1. 119). A pencil note on the verso of the binder's leaf following B⁴ of the Guildhall copy reads "perhaps the rarest of all the City Pageants: no copy but Garrick's was known to Lowndes." A note in another hand, in ink, follows this: "Bought at Deputy Whitby's sale May 1838, Cost BK." This is the date of acquisition by the Guildhall Library. The implication of the first note is that this copy was not Garrick's. If so, then Garrick's (which is traceable as far as the Heber sale of 1834) has disappeared, for the Huntington copy seems never to have belonged to him.15

The pageant was printed using two skeleton formes. The identification of these is complicated by no forme having a complete set of running-titles; however, it seems that one skeleton was used for both formes of sheet A and for outer B, with a second skeleton being constructed for inner B. The one running-title on outer A _The Triumphs of_ (A4v) also appears on A3v of inner A with the addition of another running-title, _Health and Prosperity_. It is this last title which reappears on B3 of outer B in conjunction with two new titles. Since B4v is blank, outer B would be ready for imposition after B3 had been set and so might have preceded inner B through the press.

One page, A4, of inner A has been corrected in the Guildhall copy. Four of the variants are straightforward substitutions for wrong letters (graze for grace, etc.). The change in the punctuation, however, requires the proof-reader to have read the (long) sentence with attention to sense, though not necessarily against copy. None of the corrections suggest the presence of Middleton at the printing-house. There is also one instance where a comma has failed to ink, thus giving the impression of a press-variant: on B3 the Guildhall copy lacks the Huntington's comma after _Rain-bow_, l. 198. It is possible that this was accidentally pulled during inking.
The random distribution of spelling variants suggests that the pageant was set by one compositor, probably from Middleton's holograph. There is no indication that the copy was cast-off. The same workman seems also to have been involved in the setting of Trusel's A Souldier, the other book printed by Okes in 1626. A distinctive characteristic of his is the modern use of initial lower case j and medial j instead of the more usual i. He also shows a tendency toward modern u/y usage--there are eight examples of medial v, none of which seem due to type shortage. Spellings attributable to him include preferences for the suffix -nesse, the short form of he/he or etc., upon, doe, little, -ie as in chiefe, griefe, etc., -y rather than -ie endings, and the voiced preterite and past participle in -ed or -'d.

Other characteristics include a fondness for justifying lines by spacing and a less frequent use of emphasis capitals than that of the compositors of The Sunne in Aries or The Triumphs of Integrity.

The compositor's copy was probably holograph; however, far fewer of Middleton's orthographical habits remain in Q than in either The Sunne in Aries or The Triumphs of Integrity. Of Middleton's favoured contractions e'm does not occur, does occurs once (B2) and ha's once (B2); however, there are two instances of has (B3) and three of hath (A4, B2, B2v). Only one example each of Middleton's frequent formation of the voiced preterite in -d or -de remains. In addition, there are no examples of Middleton's preferred suffix -nes and only one long form of he/he etc. (beeing B1v). Features of Middleton's orthography, as listed by David Lake, which do occur are amongst, between, toward, and the one example of the preterite in -cst (advanc'st B2). Lake's figures for these features are not, however, very reliable. There are two not three instances of both between and toward and ha's occurs 1/3 times not 0/2 (the variant spelling is has). Spellings which conform to Middleton's practice in A Game at Chess but which may also be compositorial are beene, bin, honor, and a preference for -ay as in rayse. The strong preference in Q for city, cities may well be compositorial; the word occurs once in A Game at Chess spelt cittie. I have been unable to assign the various spellings of triumph to either author or compositor.

As with The Triumphs of Integrity, the punctuation in Q is probably a sophisticated version of Middleton's; certainly his fondness for the comma is apparent. In contrast to The Triumphs of Integrity, the colon is used frequently, but parentheses are rare. The punctuation is essentially rhetorical, but the sense is always clear and Dyce's emendations are unnecessary.

The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity has been reprinted in the editions of Dyce and Bullen. The latter, however, had again not seen the original and so reprints Dyce's text. It would seem that Dyce used the uncorrected state since he notes Q's unvaleed on A4; however he does not mention any other errors on this page. The two extant copies have been collated for this edition; the Guildhall copy being used as copy-text, supplemented by a xerox of the Huntington copy for the damaged portions.
TO THE HONOR OF HIM, to whom the Noble Fraternity of Drapers, his Worthy Brothers have Consecrated their loves in Magnificent Tryumphs, the Right Honorable CUTHBERT HACKET Lord Mayor of the City of LONDON.

The Cities choyce, thy Companies free love,
This Dayes unlookt for Tryumph, all three prove,
The Happinesse of thy life to be most great;
Adde to these, Justice, and thou art Compleate.

At your Lordships Command,
Thomas Middleton.
The Triumphes of Health and Prosperity.

If you should search all Chronicles, Histories, Records, in what Language or Letter soever; if the Inquisitive Man should waste the deere Treasure of his Time and Ey-sight, He shall conclude his life onely with this certainty, that there is no Subject upon earth received into the place of his Governement with the like State and Magnificence, as is his Majesties great Substitute into his Honorable charge the City of London, bearing the Inscription of the Chamber Royall: which that it may now appeare to the world no lesse illustrated with brotherly Affection then former Tryumphall times have beene partakers of, this takes delight to present it selfe.

And first to enter the worthy love of his honorable Society, for his Lordships returne from Westminster, having received some service by water, by the Triumphant Chariot of Honor, the first that attends his Lordships most wished Arrivall, beares the Title of the Beautifull Hill, or Fragrant Garden, with flowry bankes, neere to which, Lambs and Sheepe are a grazing, this platforme so cast into a Hill, is adorned and garnisht with all variety of Odoriferous flowers, on the top Archt with an Artificial and curious Raine-bow, which both shewes the Antiquity of colours, the diversity and Noblenesse, and how much the more glorious and highly to be esteem'd, they being presented in that blessed Covenant of Mercy, the Bow in the Clouds, the worke it selfe incompast with all various fruites, and beares the name of the most pleasant garden of England (the Noble City of London) the flowers intimating the sweete odors of their Vertue and Goodnesses, and the fruites of their workes of Justice and Charity, which have bene both Honorable Brothers, and bounteous benefactors of this antient Fraternity, who are presented in a device following, under the types and figures of their Vertues in their life|time, which made them famous then, and memorable for ever, and since we are yet amongst the woolly Creatures that graze on the Beautie of this beautifull platforme, come we to the moderne use of this Noble mystery of Antient Drapery, and we shall find the whole Livery of this renowned and famous City furnished by it, it clothes the honorable Senators in their highest and chiefest wearing, all Courts of Justice, Magistrates and Judges of the Land. But for the better expression of the purpose in hand, a Speaker gives life to these following words.

The Speech in the Hill where the Raine-bow appeares.

A Cloude of griefe hath showrde upon the face
Of this sad City, and usurpt the place
Of Joy and Cheerfulnesse, wearing the forme,
Of a long blacke Eclipse in a rough storme,
With showers of Teares this garden was oreflowne,
Till mercy was like the blest Rain-bow shouone.
Behold what figure now the City beares,
Like Jems unvalued, her best joyes she weares;
Glad as a faithfull Hand-mayde to obey,
And waite upon the Honour of this Day;
Fixt in the Kings great Substitute, Delight, Triumph, and Pompe had almost lost their right:
The Garden springs agen, the Violet Beds,
The lofty Flowers beare up their fragrant heads;
Fruit over-lade their Trees, Barnes cracke with store,
And yet how much the Heavens wept before,
Threatning a second mourning; who so dull,
But must acknowledge Mercie was at full
In these two mighty blessings; what's requir'd?
That which in conscience ought to be desir'd;
Care and Uprightnesse in the Magistrates place,
And in all men Obedience, Truth and Grace.

After this awaits his Lordships approach, a Maisterpeece of Triumph, called the Sanctuary of Prosperity, on the Top Arch of which hangs the Golden Fleece, which raises the worthy memory of that most famous and renowned Brother of this Company, Sir Francis Drake, who in two yeares and ten moneths did incompasse the whole world, deserving an eminent remembrance in this Sanctuary, who never returned to his Country without the Golden Fleece of Honour and Victory. The foure faire Corinthian Columnes or Pillars, imply the foure principall Vertues, Wisedome, Justice, Fortitude, Temperance, the especiall upholders of Kingdomes, Cities and Honorable Societies.

The Speech in the Sanctuary upon the Fleece.

If Jason with the noble hopes of Greece,
Who did from Colchis fetch the Golden Fleece,
Deserve a Story of immortall fame,
That both the Asiaes celebrate his name,
What Honor, Celebration and Renowne,
In Vertues right, ought justly to be showne,
To the faire memory of Sir Francis Drake;
Englands true Jason, who did boldly make
So many rare Adventures, which were held
For worth, unmatcht, danger, unparaleld, Never returning to his Countries Eye,
Without the Golden Fleece of Victory.
The World's a Sea, and every Magistrate
Takes a yeares Voyage, when he takes this state,
Nor on these Seas, are there lesse dangers found,
Then those, on which the bold Adventurer's bound:
For Rockes, gulfes, quicke-sands, here is malice, spite,
Envy, Detraction of all Noble Right:
Vessels of Honor, those doe threaten more,
Then any Ruine betweene Sea and Shore:
Sayle then by th' Compasse of a Vertuous name,
And spite of Spites, thou bringst the Fleece of fame.

Passing from this, and more to encourage the Noble endeavours of the Magistrate, his Lordship and the worthy Company, is gracefully Conducted toward the Chariot of Honor, on the most Eminent seate thereof is Governement Illustrated, it being the proper Vertue by which we rayse the noble memory of Sir Henry Fitz-Alwin, who held the Seate of Magistracy in this City twenty foure yeares together, a most renowned Brother of this Company: In like manner, the Worthy Sir John Norman first rowed in Barge to Westminster with silver Oares, under the person of Munifi­cence: Sir Simon Eyre that built Leaden Hall, a Granary for the poore, under the Type of Piety, Et sic de caeteris.
This Chariot drawne by two Golden pellited Lyons, beeing the proper Supporters of the Companies Armes, those two that have their Seates upon the Lyons, presenting Power and Honor, the one in a little Streamer or Banneret, bearing the armes of the present Lord Maior; the other of the late,
the truely Generous and Worthy, Sir Allen Cotton Knight, a bounteous and a Noble House-keeper, one that hath spent the yeare of his Magistracy, to the great Honour of the City, and by the sweetnesse of his Disposition, and the uprightnesse of his Justice and Government, hath rays'd up a fayre lasting Memory to himselfe and his Posterity for ever; at whose happy Inauguration, though Tryumph was not then in season, (Deaths Pageants being onely advanc'est uppon the shoulders of men,) His Noble deservings were not thereby any way eclipsed.

Est Virtus sibi Marmor, et Integritate Triumphat.

The Speech of Governement.

With just propriety dos this City stand,
As fixt by fate, ith' middle of the Land,
It ha's as in the body the Heartes place,
Fit for her workes of Piety and Grace:
The Head her Soveraigne, unto whom she sends
All duties that just service comprehends;
The Eyes may be compar'd (at wisedomes rate)
To the illustrious Councellors of State,
Set in that Orbe of Royalty, to give light
To noble actions, Starres of truth and right:
The Lips, the Reverend Cleargy, Judges, all That pronounce Lawes Divine, or Temporall;
The Armes to the defensive part of men,
So I descend unto the Heart agen:
The place where now you are, witnessse the love,
True Brother-hoods cost and Tryumph, all which move
In this most grave Solemnity, and in this The Cities generall love abstracted is: And as the Heart in it's meridian seat, Is stil'd the Fountayne of the bodies heate: The first thing receives life, the last that dyes, Those properties experience well applies To this most loyall City, that hath beene In former ages as in these times seen; The Fountayne of Affection, Duty, Zeale, And taught all Cities through the Common-wealth, The first that receives quickning life and spirit, From the Kings grace, which stil she strives to inherit And like the Heart will be the last that dyes, In any duty toward good supplies: What can expresse affections nobler fruite, Both to the King, and You, his Substitute.

At the close of this Speech, this Chariot of Honor, and Sanctuary of Prosperity, with all her gracefull Concomitants, and the two other parts of Tryumph, take leave of his Lordship for that time, and rest from service till the great Feast at Guild-hall be ended, after which the whole Fabricke of the Triumph attends upon his Honour, both toward Saint Paules and homeward, his Lordship accompanied with the grave and Honourable Senators of the City, amongst whom the two worthy Shrieffes, his Lordships Grave Assistants for the yeare, the Worshipfull and generous Master Richard Fen, and Master Edward Brumfield ought not to passe of my respect unremembred, whose bounty and Noblenesse for the yeare, will no doubt, give the best expression to their owne Worthinesse. Betweene the Crosse and the entrance of Woodstreet, that part of Tryumph being planted, being the Fragrant Garden of England, with the Raine-Bow, to which the concluding Speech hath chiefly reference, there takes its farwell of his Lordship, accompanied with the Fountayne of Vertue, being the fourth part of the Tryumph.

The last Speech.

Mercies faire Object, the Caelestiall Bow,
As in the morning it began to show,
It closes up this great Tryumphall day,
And by example showes the Yeare, the Way,
Which if Power worthily, and rightly spend,
It must with Mercy both begin and end;
It is a yeare that crownes the life of man, Brings him to Peace with Honor and what can Be more desir'd, 'tis vertues harvest time,
When Gravity and Judgements in their prime,
To speake more happily, 'tis a time given
To treasure up good Actions fit for Heaven,
To a Brother-hood of Honor thou are fixt
That has stood long faire in just Vertues eye;
For within twelve yeares space, thou art the Sixt,
That has bin Lord Maior of this Company:
This is no usuall grace, being now the last,
Close the Worke Nobly up, that what is past,
And knowne to be good in the former Five:
May in thy present Care be kept alive;
Then is thy Brotherhood for their Love and Cost, Requited amply; but thy owne Soule most.
Health and a happy Peace fill all thy dayes,
When thy Yeare ends, may then begin thy prayse.

B4] For the Fabricke or Structure of the whole Tryumph, in so short a time, so gracefullly performed, the Commendation of that, the Industry of Maister Garret Chrimas may justly Challenge, a man not onely excellent in his Arte, but faith-full in his Undertakings.

FINIS.
Press variants in Q (1626)

Copies collated: G (Guildhall Library), CSmH (Henry E. Huntington Library).

Sheet A (inner forme)

Corrected: G
Uncorrected: CSmH

Sig. A4

graze] grace platforme,] ～.
come] Come unvalued] unvaleed Hand-mayde] hnd-mayde waite] waire
Substantive Changes

68 showers] Dyce; flowers Q

Textual Notes

68 showers] The compositor most likely caught fl from oreflowne at the end of this line.

73-74] Dyce emends the punctuation to read "And wait upon the honour of this day, / Fixt in the King's great Substitute: Delight..." However, Q makes good sense without emendation.

211 desir'd 'tis] Dyce inserts a query after desir'd, but the rhythm of the passage argues against this. Desir'd surely modifies vertues harvest time.
Emendations of Accidentals

64-85] italic in Q
79 before,] ~:
80 mourning;] ~,
81 full \] ~.
100-21] italic in Q
151-82] italic in Q
203-31] italic in Q
Critical Notes

Title-page] The custom of using a cut of the relevant Company's arms began in 1624 with Webster's Monuments of Honor, also printed by Okes. This is the first pageant for the Drapers' to have one on the title-page; it is not the same as those used for the Drapers' pageants of 1638 and 1639.

Text

10 The Cities...love] Cf. TT (VII, 259) "The power that heaven, love, and the city's choice / Have all conferr'd on thee."

11 unlookt for] either "unsought after," or because only the abatement of the plague in early 1626 allowed the celebrations to take place.

12-13 The...Compleate] The compounding of personal virtue with that appropriate to office is a familiar theme of Middleton's pageants.

14-15 At...Command] See note to SA, 1. 15.

17-18 Health and Prosperity] The summer of 1626 marked the country's recovery from the ravages of the plague and the associated poverty and famine.

19-27 If...Royall] Cf. TT (VII, 233) "Search all chronicles, histories, records, in what language or letter soever; let the inquisitive man waste the dear treasures of his time and eyesight, he shall conclude his life only in this certainty, that there is no subject upon earth received into the place of his government with the like state and magnificence as is the Lord Mayor of the city of London." It seems likely that Middleton retained copies or drafts of previous pageants and was not averse to re-using parts of them. Cf. Dekker, Londons Tempe, 1629 (IV, 102) "Were it possible for a Man, in the Compasse of a Day, to behold (as the Sunne does) All the Citties in the World, as if he went with Walking Beames about him; That Man should never see in any Part of the yeare, Any Citty, so Magnificently Adorned with All Sorts of Tryumphes, variety of Musicke, of Bravery, of Bewty, of Feastings, of Civill (yet Rich) Ceremonies, with gallant Lords and Ladies, and Thronges of People as London is inriched with, on the first Day, that Her Great Lord (or Lord Maior, for tis all one) Takes, That Office upon him."

25-30 Majesties...it selfe] Cf. TI, 11. 20-26 "...his Majesties Great Substitute into his Honorable charge, (the City of London,) Dignified by the Title of the Kings Chamber Royall, which that it may now appeare no lesse hightned with Brotherly Affection, Cost, Art, or Invention, then some other praecedding Triumphs (by which of late times, the Cities Honor hath beene more faithfully illustrated) this takes it's fit occasion to present it selfe."

26-27: Chamber Royall] See note to TI, 1. 22.

27-28 no lesse illustrated] possibly either a reference to Middleton's previous pageants (1621, 1622, 1623), or a compliment to Webster for his Monuments of Honor (1624), but more likely simply conventional. It follows a similar passage in TI very closely.
29-30 this...it selfe] Used in TLA (VII, 315) and THV (VII, 357).

33-34 some service...Honor] Middleton generally used one part of the pageant as a silent tableau on the water. The Grocers' traditional islands appear, appropriately enough, in their pageants, but for the other Companies the tableau seems to be chosen at random. TLA is his only Show to have a speech on the water. Unlike most of the other pageant poets, Middleton does not seem to have been particularly interested in the water show; we find no Neptune or Tethys praising England's sea-power in his pageants.

36 Lambes and Sheepe] Representing the ultimate source of the Drapers' wealth, and so essential in their pageants.

42-43 Covenant...Clouds] A reference, of course, to Noah's covenant with God (Genesis 9). Middleton uses the same image to praise the antiquity of the bow in HE, ent. ii, 1. 26.

46-48 flowers...Charity] Cf. HE, ent. vii, 11. 88-89, where Flora tells the Aldermen that "blessed fruits are found / Upon the Stocks you graft on, marke the encrease," explaining that "Faith is the Sent and Odour of the Flower, But Work's the Vertue, that makes good the power" (11. 119-20).

54-59] Cf. TI, 11. 98-104 "...descend we to the Moderne use of this Antient and Honorable Mistery, and there we shall finde the whole Livery of this most renowned and famous City, as upon this Day, and at all Solemne meetings, furnished by it; it clothes the Honorable Senators in their highest and richest Wearings, all Courts of Justice, Magistrates, and Judges of the Land." See note to this passage in TI.
57 Senators] See note to SA, 1. 78.

59-61] Cf. II, 11. 56-57 "But for the better expression of the purpose in Hand, a Speaker lends a voyce to these following words!"

64-69 A Cloude...showne] A metaphorical reference to the tribulations of the City in 1625 (the plague and the death of James I), but also a literal reference to the unusually wet weather throughout 1625 and early 1626. The rainbow thus symbolizes the restoration of the City to God's good graces, shown by both the alleviation of the plague and the improvement in the weather. It should not be forgotten that the plague was commonly regarded as a visitation from God.

67 Ecclipse] "Absence, cessation, or deprivation of light, temporary or permanent" (OED).

70-73] A neat comment on the lavishness of the celebrations.

74-75] A reference to the much adumbrated inauguration ceremonies of Allen Cotton in 1625.

76-80] Middleton is again manipulating the literal and metaphorical senses of this passage. After the appalling weather of 1625 and early 1626, there was a good summer and an excellent harvest, see Wither, Britains Remembrancer, "And Harvest came, which fild our Granards more / Then in the fruitfull'ist,of sev'n years before" (quoted in F. P. Wilson, The Plague in Shakespeare's England, p. 170).

76 Violet] Violets were particularly noted for their fragrances, see

80 a second mourning] Probably referring to the fear of famine as a result of the rain-damaged harvest as well as to the plague deaths. Perhaps a reference to the death of James I is also intended.

82 two mighty blessings] the alleviation of the plague and the good harvest. In August 1626 there had been a general fast and service at St. Paul's giving thanks for the restoration of plenty.

82-83 what's...desir'd] Cf. TLA (VII, 330): "what's desir'd? / That which in conscience ought to be requir'd."

86-87 a Maister-péece of Triumph] perhaps intended as the most elaborate of the tableaux.

95 principall Vertues] the Cardinal Virtues; as the "natural" as opposed to the "theological" virtues (Faith, Hope, and Charity) they are especially suitable public virtues. They surround the Globe of Honor in THV (VII, 365). Pillars representing virtues are a common feature of civic pageantry.

98 The Speech] The speaker, perhaps Prosperity, is not identified.

103 both...Asiaes] major and minor.

106-111] Although Middleton makes reference to Drake as a famous Draper in the prose descriptions of both SA and TI, his prominence here is unusual. The emphasis on his never returning without the Fleece of Victory may be glancing at the disastrous Cadiz expedition of 1625 which aroused unfavourable comparison with Drake's exploits there.

112 The World's a Sea] Cf. SA, 11. 67-68. There too the Mayor embarks on a metaphorical voyage for the Fleece of Fame. See also TT (VII, 254) "For power's a dangerous sea..."

119 Ruine] a wrecked ship.

120 Sayle...name] Cf. Dekker, T-NT (III, 234), "Every good man's cause / Is in all storms his Pilot: He that's sound / To himself (in Conscience) nere can run-a-ground."

122-24] Cf. SA, 11. 87-88 "Passing from this, and more to encourage the labour of the Magistrate, he is now conducted..."

124-25 Chariot of Honor] last seen on the water. Remarkably similar to the Chariot of Sacred Memory in TI.

125-29 Governement...Company] Fitz-Alwin is also "figured" under Government, his proper virtue, in TI. See note to SA, 1. 103 for biographical details.

130-32 Norman...Munificence] See note to SA, 1. 104. In TI he is figured under Honor while Sir Richard Champion and Sir John Milborne are represented by Munificence.

132-33 Eyre...Piety] See note to SA, 1. 108. He is figured under Charity in TI.
133 Et...caeteris] The rest of the Drapers' worthies probably appear, figures by their virtues, in the chariot. This may be another indication of Middleton's lack of interest in the pageant.

136-37 Power, and Honor] The Chariot of Sacred Memory in TI was also drawn by the supporters of the Company's arms ridden by these two. On that occasion their banners were of the Company's arms in addition to Martin Lumley's.

139 Allen Cotton] Alderman of Dowgate 1616-25, and of Candlewick 1625-28; Sheriff 1616-17; Lord Mayor 1625-26; Master of the Drapers' Company 1616-17; knighted 1626. Middleton here takes the opportunity to commend another patron.

144 Memory] monument (OED, sense 11).

145-46 Inauguration...season] There were no pageants at Cotton's inauguration and all ceremony was much reduced on account of the plague. The Court of Assistants notes in October 1625: "It is ordered that in regard of the great visitacion of the plague, and that the Lord Maiour Electe is to take his oath at the Tower on the Morrowe after Symon and Judes day and that only this Company is to attend his Worshipp & his brethren to the same place" (+131, 195a). This cost the Co. £191. 05. 04.

146-47 Deaths...men] Referring to the deaths from the plague (and perhaps that of King James). The passage suggests that, despite Dekker's attempts at innovation, the use of porters to transport the tableaux was still customary. The image of the triumph of Death is used by other writers on the plague. It recurs several times in Britain's Remembrancer, most notably when, inspired by the half-built structures for Charles I's Entry, Wither muses on England's ruin as symbolized by a pageant of the Chariot of Death:

But when those works, imperfect, I beheld,
    They did new causes of sad musings yeeld, Portending ruine. And, did seeme, me thought,
    In honor of Deaths trophees to be wrought;
        Much rather, then from purposes to spring
            Which aymed at the honor of a King.
    For, their unpolisht forme, did make them fit
        For direfull Showes: yea, DEATH on them did sit.
            His Captives passed under ev'ry Arch;
        Among them, as in Triumph he did march;
            Through ev'ry Street, upon mens backs were borne
                His conquests.

(p. 220)

149 Est...Triumphat] Virtue is marble unto itself and triumphs through its integrity. Source untraced.

153] According to conventional Renaissance physiology the heart was the seat of the soul and the generator of heat and vital spirits. The use of the body as a metaphor for the component parts of the body politic is commonplace, cf. Coriolanus I, i. 114-6: "The kingly crown'd head, the vigilant eye, / The counsellor heart, the arm our soldier, / Our steed the leg, the tongue our trumpeter..."

158 illustrious...State] The Privy Councillors. Some members were generally present at every LMS. In addition, Middleton may have deemed it expedient, having come under their jurisdiction in 1624 for The Game at Chess affair, to praise their virtue. The comparison of the Councillors to the eyes is particularly appropriate to their function as chief advisors to the King; they are thus illustrious because they are both "renowned" and "stars of truth and right."

163 defensive...men] soldiers.

170 Fountayne] The heart was supposedly the source of the body's heat, see R. R. Simpson, Shakespeare and Medicine (Edinburgh: Livingstone, 1959), pp. 18-19.

175 Fountayne] Kernodle, From Art to Theater, p. 72, explains that "as the city fountain was a symbol of the generosity of the city, so the tableau fountain—now as fleur-de-lis, now as the garden of the city or of the country—was a symbol of the flourishing realm of the prince."

177-80 The first...supplies] The City owes its prosperity to the King's grace in the same way that the heart receives "quickening life" from God. In return its loyalty can be counted on in any duty tending toward good. Duty is the subject of supplies.

185-95] Cf. TI, 11. 235-45 "...take leave of his Lordship for that time and rest from service til the great Feast be ended, after which the whole Body of the Triumph attends upon his Honor, both toward St. Paules, and homeward, his Lordship accompanied with the Grave and Honorable Senators of the City; amongst whom the two worthy Consulls, his Lordships Grave Assistants for the yeare, the worshipfull and Generous...ought not to passe of my respect unremembred; whose Bounty and Nobleness will proove best their own Expressers." As City officials, the Sheriffs were patrons of Middleton.
The custom of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs providing an impressive feast for Aldermen, Liverymen, and honoured guests was instituted by Sir John Shaa in 1501. In THI (VII, 305) Middleton insists that from it all "epicurism is banished; for where Honour is master of the feast, Moderation and Gravity are always attendants." The 1616 feast cost £475. 16. 06 which does not encourage belief in Middleton's assertion, see J. G. Nichols, Chrysanaleia, p. 29.

192 Fen] or Venn; Alderman of Castle Baynard 1626-34 and of Tower 1634-39: Mayor 1637-38; knighted 1638. He was a Haberdasher and prominent member of the East India Co. whose mercantile interests were closely bound up with those of Cranfield.

193 Brumfield] Leatherseller and Fishmonger; Alderman of Dowgate 1626-37 and Walbrook 1637-42; Mayor 1636-37; knighted 1637. A soap monopolist and strong supporter of Charles I, Bromfield was discharged from the Aldermanic Bench in 1642, imprisoned in 1644, and had his estates sequestered in 1646. See Pearl. pp. 293-94 for further details.

197 planted] Presumably the Fragrant Garden and the Fountain of Virtue were set up while the rest of the procession attended the service at St. Paul's.

201 Fountayne of Vertue] We are told nothing more of this tableau.

207-08] The need to temper Power with Mercy is also stressed by Middleton in An Invention, 11. 66-67 and HE, ent. vi, 11. 50-53.
215-18] The brace in Q is presumably meant to indicate the change in the rhyme scheme.

217-18] From 1614-1626 six Drapers achieved the office of Lord Mayor: Thomas Hayes, 1614-15; John Jolles, 1615-16; Edward Barkham, 1621-22; Martin Lumley, 1623-24; Allen Cotton, 1625-26; Cuthbert Hacket, 1626-27.

223-24 Then...amply] The idea that only the Lord Mayor's virtuous performance of his office can requite his brethren's generosity is also expressed by Middleton in TT (VII, 260-1) and TLA (VII, 330).

227-28 so...time] The Co. started preparations on 20 Sept.
NOTES

1 Biographical details are drawn from Beaven II, 54 and Johnson, III, 117, 119 n.2, 198 n.3. These authorities, although citing the same source (City Rep. 40, 80), differ as to the date of his translation: 24 Jan. 1623 in Beaven and 24 Jan. 1626 in Johnson. 1623 is the date given (without source but presumably from Beaven) by Tom Girtin, The Triple Crown (London: Hutchinson, 1964), p. 200. It is unlikely, however, that Hacket would be translated so far in advance. Drapers' Rep. +301, 29 lists Hacket as Assistant for 1625-26, suggesting that he did not enter the Co. until 1626.

2 MSC III, pp. 108-9; Rep. +131, 201a.

3 Cf. the Ironmongers' complaints in 1609 over Munday's Camp-bell, MSC III, p. 76: "Mr Antonie Mondaye came into Courte and the objections then made weare theise, that the children weare not instructed their speeches which was a spetiall judgment of the consideration, then that the Musick and singinge weare wanting, the apparrell most of it old and borrowed, with other defects..."

4 R. C. Bald, "Middleton's Civic Employments," pp. 75-6. The following entries from City Rep. 40, fos. 84, 243, 268 are taken from Withington, I, 234-235.

5 Bergeron, Civic Pageantry, p. 261.

6 Both SA and TJ run to approximately 315 lines.

7 £545. 13. 08 is the figure given by Johnson, III, 117. It corresponds to the total disbursed by the Wardens Bachelors. A further £66. 13. 04 was paid to Hacket to beautify his residence from House funds. The cheapest Show in this period was Munday's Sidero-Thriambos (1618) for the Ironmongers; it cost £523. 11. 09 (MSC III, p. 98).

8 The major exception to this is the cost of food; dinners, breakfasts, and provisions invariably cost more in 1626. This is probably a result of rising food prices after the plague and bad harvest of 1625. The customary fees generally remain the same.

9 Wickham, EES, II,1,212.

10 Bowers, II, 285. These included cucumbers, pumpkins, grapes, apples, pears, cherries, roses, and lillies.
This was not an uncommon image, cf. Wither, Britain's Remembrancer, reprinted by the Spenser Soc. (Manchester, 1880), "the meaning of the title-page": (italics reversed)

I saw a dismal Cloud
Exceeding Blacke, as from the Sea ascending,
And over all this Isle it selfe extending:
With such thicke foggie Vapours, that their steames Seem'd, for a while, to darken MERCIES beames.
Within this fearfull Cloud, I did behold
All Plagues and Punishments, that name I could.
And with a trembling heart, I fear'd each houre,
God would that Tempest on this Island poure.
Yet, better hopes appear'd: for, loe, the Rayes
Of MERCY pierc'd this Cloud...

This is to some extent apparent in Middleton's previous pageant, THV (1624) for the Grocers' Co. There, however, it is mitigated by his obvious interest in the tableaux themselves.

Index to the STC, p. 56. C. W. Miller, "A London Ornament Stock," p. 131 notes that after Nicholas Okes' son John took up his freedom in January 1626, the partnership arrangements that they "entered into with each other and with others cannot always be determined with any certainty." Such arrangements may explain the apparent lack of work in Okes' shop in 1626.

John Nichols, "London Pageants in the Reign of Charles I," The Gentleman's Magazine, 94, No. 2 (1824), 412 knew only of Garrick's copy which he had not seen. He quotes, apparently from the title-page, but without giving a source for his information: "The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity, at the Inauguration of the most worthy brother, the Right Hon. Cuthbert Hasket, Draper. Composed by Thomas Middleton, Draper, 1626." It is most improbable that this is accurate; it bears no resemblance to the title-page of the extant copies. In view of Johnson's assertion (III, 10; see p. 94) that Middleton was a Draper, Nichols ascription of membership to him is interesting. However, his failure to get the Lord Mayor's name right does not inspire confidence.

These spelling preferences can also be traced in A Souldier.

Lake, p. 273.
Figure 14. Two pages from the Crane MS of An Invention.

Present your Duty to these Men of worth, and

Hono

Aetna

Weälce

when so we open our heart

time

Tell me, oh tell me: what is she appertaining

so like a Son of Fame as beauty

a Sheaf of Arrows, bound with golden Bands.

Base

This Hono, with two armed Hands

shewing the figure of his who gives it, and entertains

Getway Papers

A braue Emblems for the Male

Entire beheld

Base

Nor for his Care

a better Symbol (what I woul'd or sought ) being armed at all parts to doe Merit right.

Meanes

what word's that

Base

Diligentia

To the Male
Critical Introduction

The last of these entertainments is very different. The Invention performed for...Edward Barkham is a slight, indoor piece intended to ornament a feast given during Easter week 1622 for the Aldermen by Lord Mayor Barkham, whose inaugural pageant Middleton had written some months earlier. Although Middleton and his contemporaries would have called such entertainments pageants, they are usually excluded from modern considerations of civic pageantry on the grounds of their being indoor, private celebrations. However, similarities of function, content, and technique ally them closely to the Lord Mayor's Show. Although not intended for a wide audience, the willingness of the City to employ a professional dramatist to write them indicates its awareness of the value of ceremonial drama as an expression of its power and standing. Furthermore, despite the unsuitability of the lavish spectacle of the street shows to the banqueting hall, the tableaux devised by Middleton in both this entertainment and the similar ones in Honourable Entertainments (1621) bear a striking resemblance to some in his Lord Mayor's Shows. So, for instance, he has already used the device of Barkham's arms and motto as a component of the Tower of Vertue tableau in The Sunne in Aries, before featuring it as the centre-piece of this entertainment. And the emblematic technique employed here by Middleton (picture, motto, and verse) is in essence the same as in his mayoral shows.
Banquet entertainments were, in fact, a long-established tradition with civic officials and Livery Companies. Glynne Wickham discusses the allegorical mummings and disguisings written by John Lydgate between 1425-35 for the Mercers, Goldsmiths, and other groups to present to the Lord Mayor on such occasions as May Day, Candlemas, and Epiphany. Essentially, these pieces involved the entry of disguisers bearing gifts, accompanied by a Presenter who expounded the allegorical basis of the entertainment. So, for instance, at a Goldsmiths' feast for the Lord Mayor at Candlemas, a herald called Fortune introduces a group of Levites, ambassadors from King David, who present Lord Mayor Eastfield with gifts both hevenly and moral,

Apperteyning un-to good governaunce
Un-to the Mayre for to do plesaunce.

The gifts are appropriately symbolized by a gold ark containing a "wrytt" that specifies "Where yee shall punysshe and where as yee shal spare / And howe that Mercy shal Rygour modefye." The Levites do not speak, but they are instructed to sing by Fortune.

Despite the passage of two hundred years, the continuity of tradition between Lydgate and Middleton is immediately apparent; certainly Middleton's invention is scarcely more dramatic. In effect he has simply reversed Lydgate's order, the singers present an allegorical personage who discourses upon the nature of "good governaunce" and explicates the device. Although there is little evidence to go on, it seems likely that similar entertainments took place on important feast days throughout the intervening period. In the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries the Drapers regularly hired players and minstrels to celebrate festive occasions; for instance, in 1517 they paid 8/8 to "John Slye & his company for ij plays for monday and tuysday & for a mery conseyt for the Bachillers Brekefast." In the second half of the sixteenth century and the early seventeenth, dramatic entertainments at the halls of the Companies or at the residences of civic officials included plays, masques, and "conceits" or inventions that cannot have differed in essentials from those written by Middleton in the 1620s.

This type of entertainment is clearly something that Middleton was adept at. Honourable Entertainments, printed in 1621, includes ten others that vary from simple speeches to more complex semi-dramatic presentations. The early pieces in this volume were composed before Middleton was appointed City Chronologer in September 1620; Lord Mayor Cokayne and the Aldermen must, therefore, have been well-satisfied with his work. One of the explicit duties of his new post was as "Inventor of honorable entertainments for this Citty," and the remaining pieces in the printed volume and this MS represent a fair sample of the sort of work involved. Payment for such entertainments was covered by his salary as Chronologer. On occasion, however, he received extra payment or benefits: one such, on 7 May two weeks after the performance of An Invention, granted him the nomination of one person to the freedom of the City, for "the better encouragement in his labours," suggesting that Lord Mayor Barkham was pleased with the entertainment.

The date of An Invention has been open to some question.
formation of the final 2 of 1622 is somewhat irregular, leading the nineteenth-century transcriber of the MS to read it as 1623. This date was followed by Bullen in vol. VII of his edition, even though this same volume contains the correctly dated pageants for Barkham and his successor Peter Proby. The transcript's 1623, however, has been emended by another hand to 1622, April 22nd, and this date also appears in vol. I of Bullen's edition and (with the addition of a query) in CSPD. I have been unable to find any evidence for the provenance of this date. The MS itself tells us that the entertainment was presented "in the Easter Hollidajes."

22 April, 1622 was Easter Monday and so, in fact, is a possible date. The content of Honor's speech makes it clear that the piece was designed for a similar occasion to entertainment viii of Honourable Entertainments, the Easter banquet that followed "the Times of that Blessed and laudable Custome of Celebrating the memory of Pious workes in this Cittie, at St. Mary Spittle."\(^7\)

The Easter sermons on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of Easter week at the Spital were a tradition dating back to the late fourteenth century.\(^8\) They were attended by the civic dignitaries and the Master and Children of Christ's Hospital. Although nominally on the topic of Christ's resurrection, the sermons had, by early in Elizabeth's reign, become associated with the City's charitable works and the collection was devoted to the relief of London's needy.\(^9\) Thus this invention must have taken place on one of these three days, but there is no indication which of these days is the most likely.
An Invention was performed during or after a feast at Lord Mayor Barkham's house, and in the tradition of banquet interludes and conceits, makes use of the layout of the great hall. The Lord Mayor and his most important guests would be seated at the upper end of the hall, with the remainder of the guests at side tables, thus leaving a central space for the performers. At the lower end of the hall would have been some kind of hall screen with doors to shut off the kitchens. There is some indication in the text that Barkham's hall also possessed a gallery over the screen, some at least of the musicians may have been stationed here.

The entertainment's centrepiece is a long speech by Honor focusing on the allegorical significance of the Lord Mayor's crest, two arms in armour embowed proper, holding a sheath of arrows or, feathered argent, and banded with a ribbon gules. However, the invention opens and closes with part songs for Mean, Base, and Chorus. This is a technique that Middleton had used before: in the first piece in Honourable Entertainments (also written for an Easter feast) Middleton describes the Gentleman Sewer (who functions equivalently to Honor) being "conducted by the City Musicke, toward the high Table, a song giving notice of his Entrance" (ll. 14-16). It seems likely that the City waits, as was a regular part of their duties, were similarly employed in 1622. Meane begins the first song with the traditional cry of interluders at feasts: "A hall: a hall: below: stand cleere." The use of "below" strongly suggests that Meane, and perhaps Base, the Chorus, and any accompanying musicians, were in the gallery. Meane's cry for room and the ensuing song thus cover the entry of Honor at the lower end of the hall and his approach to the High Table, the position most appropriate to the demonstration of the significance of his emblematic attire and properties.

This opening song indicates clearly the ceremonial nature of the entertainment by proffering the singers' service to the Aldermen. For those who had not already guessed, Honor's identity is established and the import of Barkham's crest and motto expounded. They represent not only his honourable descent and suitability for high office, but also the moral character of his guests, as demonstrated earlier in the day by their good works. The extension of significance from the Lord Mayor to the Aldermen is further developed in the speech by Honor that follows. His martial habit notwithstanding, his intention is to make clear the "Vse and Application" of the device, thereby contributing to the "Profit & Comfort" of the guests. This he achieves by considering the various elements of the crest: the mailed arms signify the armour of a Christian, the arrows justice modified by the silken band of mercy. But, he explains, "an other way: to make it generall" is to see the crest as an emblem of the community of City government, the arrows are now the Aldermen and the band the Mayor who unites them. On yet another level, the sheaf of arrows stands for the pious deeds of the City fathers celebrated earlier that day; as they protect the weak, so may God with His arrows protect them. The final song again relates the occasion to the tableau. The feast is another manifestation of the bounty required of those who hold high office. Such lavishness ensures "that this Citties honor maie/Spred as far as Morne shootes Daie." And if the Aldermen remember and continue to act upon the significance of the entertainment they have just seen, relieving the wants of the unfortunates of London, then Vertue as well will "spred forth as Morne shootes Daie."

The striking image of spreading light in this final refrain develops neatly from the arrows of the device, reminding us at the same time of Middleton's insistence throughout his civic works on the duty of magistrates to be "Lights and Presidents in Lives,/Noble Examples, Honours t'Age and Time." The piece is indeed slight, but the banquet demanded no more, and Middleton shows again his ability to highlight the communal, ceremonial nature occasion with an entertainment that must have amused, flattered, and encouraged the Lord Mayor and his worthy guests.

Textual Introduction

An Invention performed for...Edward Barkham is a MS entertainment in the hand of Ralph Crane preserved among the Conway Papers in the Public Record Office, London (State Papers, Domestic,14, vol. 129, document 53). The title page reads:

An Invention
performed for the Service of ye Right honorable Edward Barkeham,L.
Majo". of the Cittie of London: At his LPS. Enterteinment of the Aldermen his Brethren, and the hble and worthie Guests: (At his House assembled & ffeasted In the Easter Hollidajes: 1622.

written by
Tho. Middleton.

The MS is in octavo with eight unwatermarked leaves, each measuring approximately 145 x 95 mm., but is bound in two blank conjugate leaves of vellum. The foot of the leaves has been severely damaged, perhaps by damp, and some of the text is missing.

The scribe was first identified as Crane by F. P. Wilson. The entertainment is in fact his first dated MS and may mark the beginning of his association with Middleton. Certainly in the mid 1620s Crane made several transcripts of Middleton's work, perhaps to his order: The Witch (c. 1625?), and the Malone, Lansdowne, and Folger (Archdall) MSS of A Game at Chess (1624-25). It is likely that Middleton wanted a transcript of his invention for presentation to Lord Mayor Barkham for whom the entertainment was tailor-made. However, the poor quality of the paper and the relatively unelaborate calligraphy of the MS suggest that Crane did not consider it a particularly important piece of work. The presence of the MS in the papers of Sir Edward Conway when they were acquired by the State Paper Branch Record Office in 1857 has not been accounted for.

Crane's hand in the MS intermixes secretary and italic forms; its characteristics have been described by F. P. Wilson and T. H. Howard-Hill. It is extremely legible, although problems do arise in differentiating majuscule and minuscule forms of certain letters, especially w, s, l, v, and y. Contractions, particularly wth, ye, hono, and armo, are used frequently in the text as well as in the title-page and stage directions. Although it is probably safe to assume that Middleton's holograph underlies the MS, the majority of the accidentals are Crane's. This is especially noticeable in the punctuation: the frequent colons are certainly Crane's who regularly preferred them to Middleton's commas. However, the final line of the second song ends with a comma and this may well be Middleton's; the Trinity MS and the Middleton sections of the Bridgewater MS of A Game at Chess show that Middleton was not averse to ending speeches with such a light mark of punctuation. The spelling of the MS of this entertainment closely follows the spelling preferences identified as Crane's by Howard-Hill, although some preferences, such as -nes and perhaps cittie, are Middleton's as well. The absolute preference shown for -s plurals of nouns with short vowels (e.g. hands) is distinctively Crane's, as are such spellings as nobeler, woond, and howre. The calligraphy and orthography of the MS are plainer than in Crane's other transcripts and it is probably for this reason that some characteristics of these, such as his fondness for hyphens and Jonsonian elisions (the use of an apostrophe to indicate elision even though no letters are omitted, e.g. I'am), are absent. In addition, all speech headings in the MS are centred, rather than placed in the left-hand margin as is the case with his dramatic transcripts.

The MS is accompanied in the State Papers by a nineteenth-century transcript. This makes some attempt to follow the spelling of the original while partially regularizing the punctuation and other accidentals. The unknown transcriber has inserted conjectural readings within square brackets for the damaged portions of the MS. Since the conjectures are less extensive than would now be necessary, it is possible that the decay was less advanced when the transcript was made. However, the transcript's readings are so unreliable as to deny it any authority. The transcriber's carelessness and lack of familiarity with the secretary hand and early seventeenth-century idiom lead him into a variety of errors in both conjectural and non-conjectural readings. For instance, in 1. 43 the transcript reads your for what is clearly yond, in 1. 48 it reads noble for nobeler, and in 1. 92 land for hand. The unreliability of the transcript's conjectural readings is demonstrated in 11. 22-23: the transcript reads "Shewing the figure of his [worth] / Who give it and deserves it both." Leaving aside the misreading of give for gives, it is clear from the MS that whatever the final word of 1. 22 is, it does not begin with w. No w, majuscule or minuscule, secretary or italic, in either this MS or in the Crane facsimiles printed by Wilson is formed like this. This must cast severe doubt on the reliability of the transcript's apparently non-conjectural it both in the following line.

In addition to these errors we also find others deriving from the transcriber's failure to understand the nature of the occasion for which the entertainment was written; an example of this is the conjecture wicked deafe in 1. 98. While there is no palaeographic ground for dismissing this reading, the sense of the passage requires a different conjecture. The transcriber has not realized that the entertainment was presented to celebrate the City government's pious works. The arrows here signify these good works, and are therefore charitable rather than destructive. The point of the song is not that the deaf, lame, and dumb are wicked, but that their wants need relieving. I have therefore denied any authority to the transcript's readings of lacunae in the MS unless these can be confirmed either palaeographically or by the sense of the passage.
Angle brackets enclose missing text, and letters within these can be conjectured from traces in the MS. Square brackets enclose editorial conjectures.

The MS was apparently unknown to the first editor of Middleton's work, Alexander Dyce, but it was printed by Bullen in his edition. Bullen at times, however, seems to have based his text upon the transcript, thus perpetuating such misreadings as your and land. In addition, he introduces new ones such as matre in 1. 31 and To for for in 1. 59, and occasionally discards Crane's sound punctuation in favour of his own, thereby completely altering the sense of the original. In short his edition cannot be trusted.

The damage to the MS and its being in the hand of Crane, a scribe important to the drama generally and Middleton particularly, have dictated a more conservative approach to the text than is appropriate to the printed texts of the three Lord Mayor's Shows. I have therefore retained Crane's use of i/j and u/v and his secretarial contractions and abbreviations, although no attempt has been made to reproduce any calligraphic flourishes or to distinguish between italic and secretary versions of the same letter. I have also retained Crane's punctuation, including his use of question marks in exclamatory sentences; however, faulty or missing punctuation at the end of a speech has been corrected. Stage directions have been centred and appear in italic; names of characters within these appear in roman. Speech headings have been shifted from the centre of the page to the left-hand margin; missing punctuation at the end of these has been altered to a full stop. Crane's lineation in the songs and speeches has been preserved in order to assist reconstruction of damaged passages even when this does not correspond to lines of verse. Lines of verse which Crane did not begin with a capital, a common practice of his, have not been regularized.

Figure 15: Barkham's crest.
An Invention performed for the Service of ye Right honorable Edward Barkeham, L. Major of the Cittie of London:

At his Entertainment of the Aldermen his Brethren, and the h[ble] and worthie Guests: (At his House assembled & feasted) In the Easter Hollidajes: 1622. written by Tho. Middleton.

1\v blank

A Song in severall parts: vsshering toward the high Table, a Personage in Armo[r], representing Hono[r]. holding in his Hands a Sheaffe of Arrowes.

Meane. A hall: a hall: below: stand cleere: 10 what? are you readie?

Base. < >

Meane. < >

Present your Duties to those Men of worth, and Hono[r].

Chorus. We reioice when so we spend Art, howre, & Voice.

Meane. Tell me: oh tell me: what is he appeeres so like a Son of Fame, & beares a Sheafe of Arrowes, bound w[th] silken Bands?

Base. 'Tis Hono[r] with two armed Hands shewing the figure of his C[rest] who giues it, and deserves C[it] b C[est]
Meane. I, brauer Embleme for the Place
I nere beheld.

Base. Nor for his Race
a fitter Symbole (wthout Pride, or Spight) being armd at all points, to doe Merit right.

Meane. what word's that?

Base. Diligentia

Meane. [This hono]rd Daie

Chorus. Wee joy to see Your Places, and your Works agree.

Finis. 1 Song.

Then Hono' deliuers this speech.
Though in this Martiall habit I ([appeere])
I bring nor cause of doubt, nor tho([ught of feare])

'Tis onely a waie found to expres best the worthie ff[igure] of yond Noble Crest Nor barely to be showne is the Intent and scope of this Times Service: More is ment.

There's Vse & Application, whence arise Profit & Comfort to the Graue & Wise.'

A nobeler Embleme of Charge, Powre, & Place
Justice & Valour, neuer yet did grace

Two armed Armes: to what may they allude more properer then to Truth, and Fortitude?

the Armo'r of a Christian? To be strong in a just Cause then to theis Armes belong.
The Sheafe of Arrowes, what doe they Implie but Shafts of Justice'gainst Impietie?
Yet they must passe through a Iuditious hand for see, they'r tyde w'th Mercies silken Band.
They must not inconsideratly be spent but vsd like Weapons of iust Punishment.

And as it is in course of Combat knowne
'tis not the propertie of one hand alone
both to defend, and offend at one time,
So let not one hand passe vpon a Crime the waight may fall too heavy: but take both Mercie w'th Justice, Twyns of equall growth:
those carry a Cause levell through a Land,
for no man shootes an Arrow w'th one hand,

'[[Believe we]] this: doe Envie what it can

Conscience is an armed Man.

An other way: to make it generall
For 'tis an Embleme that concerns you all You of the hono'rable Brotherhood knitt altogether for the Citties good.
In whose grave Wisedomes, her faire Strength doth stand.
You are the Sheafe: the Magistrate ye Band whose Loue is woond about you: witnes be his Bountie, and his Welcom, both most free.
And as this Daie you saw the g[ol]den Sheafe of this blessed Citties works in [t]he [releife] of the poore Fatherles: May you behold that Sheafe of Glorie, y[ ]t makes drosse of Gold.
th' Almightyes Arrowes, on your Enemies fall, and heauens armed Armes, protect you all.

2. Song.
Meane. Ioie be euer at your Feastes.
Chorus. [That this] Citties honor maie [Spred as far] as Morne shootes Daie.

6\[\]
Meane. Faire your Fortunes euer be.
Base. Plentie bles the hand that's free.
Chorus. That this Citties hono' maie
spred as far as Morne shootes Daie.
Meane. Health your Powres with gladnes fill.
Base. Iustice be your Armo', still.
Meane. Pious Works the golden Sheafe.
Base. Those Arrowes strike the [blind and deafe]
7\[\]
Meane. and dombe.
Base. and Lame.
Chorus. So Vertue maie
spred forth as far as Morne shootes Daie.

finis
Substantive Changes

5 1622] MS; 1623 T, Bullen.

12-13 ⟨...he...⟩ MS; [Come] enter / then T; [enter.] / then Bullen.

22-23 ⟨Cr[est]...⟨[it]⟩ b⟨[est]⟩⟩ ed; [worth...it both] T, Bullen.

24 I,] Ay, Bullen; I MS.

31 F⟨ortu⟩ n⟨[ae]⟩] I.

31 Mater] MS, Bullen; Matre T.

32 ⟨[This hono]rd] I.

40-41 ⟨[appeere]...tho⟨[ught of feare]⟩⟩ MS; thought [of feare] T.

70 [Beleeue we]] I; [Believe me] Bullen

71 ⟨]MS; [Religious] I.

80-81 g⟨[ol]⟩den...⟨[t]⟩he⟨[releife]⟩] I.

88 ⟨[wel]⟩com MS; welcome I.

89-90 ⟨[That this]⟩...⟨[Spred as far]⟩] I.

92 hand] MS; Land T, Bullen.

98 ⟨[blind and deafe ]]⟩ed; [wicked deafe] I, Bullen.
Textual Notes

5 1622] See p.273 for the question of the date.

12-13] Neither T's nor Bullen's reading is satisfactory. First, enter does not rhyme with cleere. Second, Crane nowhere else in An Invention begins a line in the centre of the page rather than at the left-hand margin, so it is extremely unlikely that l. 13 consists simply of then. Only the he is now clear in this line although traces of preceding and succeeding letters which could be t and n respectively are visible. It is probable that a full line has been lost.

22-23] T's conjecture worth is palaeographically unsound. Traces of the initial letter(s) of this word remain, but do not correspond to any of Crane's ws. They strongly resemble, however, the Cr of Crest in l. 43. This casts serious doubt on T's apparently non-conjectural reading it both in l. 23; only b is now visible. I suggest that Crest...it best is more convincing palaeographically and, by introducing immediately the significance of Barkham's crest, makes better sense.

24 I,] This reading makes good, if rather inelegant, sense. However, Bullen may well be right in suggesting that Crane caught I from the following line when he should have read A.

50 [Occasion] T's conjecture A station makes sense, but is rather repetitive. The passage seems rather to demand the application of the crest to the occasion: Barkham's crest effectively symbolizes the significance of the celebration of the City's pious works.
51] T's conjecture anticipates the development of the speech as well as being syntactically and metrically clumsy.

52-56] Bullen jettisons the sound punctuation of the MS in favour of his own, thereby changing the meaning of the entire passage. His version runs:

Two armed arms--to what may they allude
More properer than to truth and fortitude,
The armour of a Christian, to be strong
In a just cause? Then to these arms belong
The sheafs of arrows...

(VII, 375)

71] T's Religious is a possible, but not entirely convincing, reading.

92 hand] T and Bullen both misread the italic h as l, although no form of Crane's l in the MS corresponds. The italic h, however, is common.

98 ([blind and deafe]) T's conjecture wicked deafe suggests that he has failed to realize that the arrows of Barkham's crest operate on more than one level of significance. Although in l. 57 the arrows function as "Shafts of Iustice," by l. 80 they represent the City's pious works. This sense is developed in the final song, and, therefore, the handicapped must be objects of charity not targets for destruction.
Emendations of Accidentals

24 I,] ~∧

51 Magistrate).] ~ ~∧
Critical Notes

2 Barkeham] The Lord Mayor for whom Middleton had written SA in 1621. See p.106 for biographical details.

5 Easter...1622] See p.273 for a consideration of problems regarding the date.

7 seuerall parts] base, mean, and chorus; possibly sung by the City waits. A pun is intended.

8 a Personage] Honor is dressed to represent Barkham's crest. He appears in different guise in THI (1617) and THV (1622).

10 a hall...stand cleere] the traditional cry for room. Cf. HE, ent. i, l. 18, "Roome, roome, make roome."

22 his (Cr[est])] Barkham's.

29 word] Presumably Barkham's motto, Diligentia Fortunae Mater, was inscribed on the representation of his crest.

30-31] Diligence is the mother of Fortune. Middleton also makes use of an inscription of Barkham's motto in SA. As Meane goes on to point out, it is a motto especially appropriate to City officials, cf. the "ceaslesse labour" required of the Aldermen in HE, ent. i. l. 74.

43 Crest] It is possible that Honor is referring to a representation of Barkham's crest decorating the banqueting room, rather than the one he himself is carrying.
48] In ent. i of HE, ll. 47-48, Cokayne's symbol, the cock-cup, is described as "An Emblem of your worth, charge, power, & state, / None, Noblier can expresse a Magistrate."

52 Two armed Armes] part of the crest.

54 the...Christian] commonplace derived ultimately from Ephesians vi. 11-17.

57 Shafts of Justice] The necessity for the magistrate to temper justice with mercy is a common theme of Middleton's civic works, cf. especially HE, ent. vi, 1. 50; ent. ii uses a similar archery analogy.

70 Envie] a common Middleton villain in the civic entertainments, see IT (VII, 244).

80-82] The sheaf is golden as in Barkham's crest. The entertainment was specifically designed to celebrate the City's charitable works; it had an especial responsibility for the relief of orphans.

84 Almightyes Arrowes] not to be confused with either the arrows of 1. 56 or those of 1. 98.

90 Cf. HE, ent. v, 1. 54, "the faire Sun shoots splendor through his cloud."
NOTES

1 An Invention is sometimes referred to as A Song in Several Parts; this, however, is derived from the directions for the first song and not from the title-page, and I have, therefore, avoided using it.

2 So Middleton refers to ent. iv of HE as "this sad Pageant" (1. 11). Cf. David Bergeron's definition of civic pageantry as entertainments "generally accessible to the public...[that] always occurred outdoors" Civic Pageantry, pp. 2-3. Nevertheless, he includes the essentially private, albeit outdoor, entertainments provided for Elizabeth at Kenilworth and Elvetham.

3 EES, I, 191-202. The following quotations from Lydgate are taken from this source.

4 MSC III, p. 136; see also Lusher, "Guild Drama," p. 158.

5 Dyce, I, xix-xxvii, prints most of the entries from City records relating to Middleton's employment.

6 Analytical Index to the Remembrancia (London, 1898) p. 305.

7 HE, ent. viii, 11. 2-5. Unfortunately, the headings to ents. viii-x are confusing, and it is hard to determine the day when ent. viii took place. It is not clear whether 11. 7-8 in ent. ix, apparently fixing the date of ent. viii as Thursday of Easter week, refers to ent. viii in the form printed. There were no Spital sermons on the Thursday.

9 Remembrancia, pp. 52-53. In 1582 there was a dispute between the Queen and the City over the right to nominate recipients of the money collected at these sermons.

12 Woodfill, Musicians in English Society, pp. 33-53 discusses the duties of the waits at City banquets and festivities.

13 HE, ent. i, 11. 71-72.

14 F. P. Wilson, "Ralph Crane, Scrivener to the King's Players," The Library, 4th ser., 7 (1926), 197-8.

15 It is unlikely that the MS was made for presentation to Conway. According to Collier, his papers at one time included another dramatic MS, Massinger's now lost Philenzo and Hippolyto, see Works, I, xxvii, but it is not known either how this got included with state documents. Since, however, Conway was Secretary to the Privy Council at the time of A Game at Chess, it is possible that some Middleton papers were called in for examination, and this might explain the presence of An: Invention among his papers.

16 Wilson, p. 202; T. H. Howard-Hill, Ralph Crane and Some Shakespeare First Folio Comedies (Charlottesville, Va.: Univ. of Virginia Press, 1972), pp. 16-68.

17 Howard-Hill, p. 43, comments that Crane's use of contractions diminishes sharply after his transcription of Barnavelt in 1619. Their high incidence in An Invention may be another example of Crane's un-elaborate style in this transcription.

18 Howard-Hill, p. 38.

19 Ibid. pp. 61-68.
SELECTED REFERENCES

Books

---------. " The Christmas Family: Artificers in English Civic Pageantry." English Literary History, 35 (1968), 354-64.

Campbell, Lily B. Scenes and Machines on the English Stage during the Renaissance. Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1923.

----------. Lord Mayors' Pageants: Being Collections Towards a History of these Annual Celebrations. Percy Soc., X. London, 1843-44.

Londini Emporia, or Londons Mercatura. London, 1633.

Londini Speculum: or, Londons Mirror. London, 1637.

Londins'Jus Honorarium.. London, 1631.

Porta Pietatis, or, The Port or Harbour of Piety. London, 1638.

...from the Court of Spaine. London, 1623.

Kaplan, Joel H. "Middleton's Tamburlaine." English Language Notes, 13 (1976), 258-60.

------------------. The Triumphs of Integrity. London, 1623.

----------. Metropolis Coronata, the Triumphes of Ancient Drapery. London, 1615.
----------. Sidero-thriambos or Steele and Iron Triumfing. London, 1618.

----------. The Progresses and Public Processions of Queen Elizabeth. 3 vols. London, 1823.

Squire, John. Tes Irenes Trophaea or, the Tryumphs of Peace. London, 1620.

--------- The Triumphs of Fame and Honour. London, 1634.

Wadmore, James F. Some Account of the Worshipful Company of Skinners. 2nd ed. 1876; rpt. London: Nichols, 1902.

---------. "The Lord Mayor's Show in Tudor and Stuart Times." Guildhall Miscellany, 1, No. 10 (1959), 3-18.

Wilson, F. P. "Ralph Crane, Scrivener to the King's Players." The Library, 4th Ser., 7 (1926/27), 194-215.

---------. "The Lord Mayor's Show for 1623." PMLA, 30 (1915), 110-15.

Manuscripts

--------- Quarterage Books.
--------- Renter's Accounts.
--------- Repertories.
--------- Wardens' Accounts.
--------- Wardens of the Bachelors' Accounts.

APPENDIX I: THE PRINTING OF LORD MAYOR'S SHOWS, 1602-1639.

Information about the printing of the texts of Lord Mayor's Shows can be derived from three sources, the texts themselves, the records of the Companies responsible for the Shows and the Stationers' Register. Analysis of these suggests that there was considerable variation from Company to Company and, even when the same Company is involved, from year to year. The custom of printing the text may date back to 1566, although as the editors of Malone Society Collections III point out, the printing may have been for the benefit of the performers (p.xxxii). Peele's Device of the Pageant borne before Woolstane Dixi survives from 1585 and his text for the 1588 Show was entered in the Stationers' Register upon condition that it be licensed; it is no longer extant. In 1602 Anthony Munday was paid 30/- for printing the books of the speeches for his now lost Show for that year. In 1604 the Haberdashers' Company paid a similar sum for printing. Thereafter prices seem to have risen. £4 was usual, but in 1605 Munday received £6 for having the books of the speeches in the pageant and the other shows printed; perhaps extra copies were needed. From this time, probably as a result of Munday's involvement in all aspects of pageant production, the writer, sometimes in conjunction with the artificer, was usually responsible for arranging the printing and providing the Company with a fixed number of copies. When, in the 1630s, the artificer takes over the organization, this duty devolves upon him as well. The majority of texts were printed by Nicholas Okes. After 1621 either he or his son, John, was responsible for almost all of them.
Generally, as in 1609, 1611, 1617, 1622, 1629, and 1635 the Company involved seems to have wanted five hundred copies. In 1613 and 1617 the Grocers' Company, instead of making Middleton responsible for the printing, paid Nicholas Okes directly for their five hundred copies: these cost them £4. In 1631 and 1632 the Haberdashers required only three hundred copies, but in 1638 the Drapers paid John Okes 40/- for an unspecified number of "bookes printing for the Companie over and above the number [500] they were to have had by agreement from Mr. Christmas" (MSC III, p. 127). In some years at least, however, more copies were printed than were required by the Company. So the title-page of Troia-Nova Triumphans (1612) states that copies were "Printed by Nicholas Okes, and are to be sold by John Wright." And in December 1616 the Fishmongers' Company Court Ledger records that "Anthony Munday did exhibitt his peticion to have some gratificacion gyven him for 200 bookes of the late shewes and speeches [Chrysanaleia] of the presentment of the Lord maior more than he agreed to delyver them" (MSC III, p. 91). This suggests that Munday had arranged the printing of at least two hundred extra copies in the hope of selling them and, having failed to do so, was desirous of cutting his losses. Furthermore, the involvement of an independent publisher, Henry Gosson, in 1621 and 1634, again suggests that some copies were designed for public sale. Finally, the existence of two editions for certain pageants, Chrusothriambos (1611), set partly from standing type, and The Triumphs of Truth (1613) with the addition of the New River Entertainment, also indicates that not all copies were privately distributed. 3

Until 1633 the Companies seem to have wanted the texts to commemorate the occasion. All the evidence until this date from both the Stationers' Register and the texts themselves points to printing taking place after the performance. In Londini Emporia (1633), however, Heywood declines to describe the first tableau because "the Fabricke it selfe being visible to all, needeth not any expression from me" (sig. A4v). And this use of the texts as programmes seems to have continued in the remaining Shows before the Interregnum. Whether the pageants were printed before or after 29 October, speed must have been of the essence. The Company would naturally want its presentation copies with all despatch, and if either writer, printer, or publisher were to make any money from public sales, they would also require copies to be available as soon as possible.
NOTES

1 The following pageants were listed in the SR: Peele's 1588 text, the non-extant 1604 text, Dekker's T-NT (1612), Middleton's TT (1613), Munday's Chrysanaleia (1616), and Taylor's The Triumphs of Fame and Honour (1634).

2 The following figures are taken from MSC III entries for these years.

3 MSC III, p. xxxiii suggests that "in 1611, 1613, and 1616, the Stationers' Register entries may refer to the second issues of the pamphlets"; however, the 1611 text (Chruso-thriambos) was not entered in SR. Scaturigo was not entered either.

4 The 1588 text was entered on 28 Oct., the 1604 and 1616 texts on 29 Oct., and the 1613 text on 3 Nov. T-NT was entered on 21 Oct. "to be printed when further authorised." In addition, Camp-bell and T-NT refer to events occurring on the day of the performance and so were clearly written afterwards.

5 So, for instance, TFH was entered in the SR on 14 Oct., allowing sufficient time for printing before 29 Oct.
APPENDIX II: EXTRACTS FROM THE BOOKS OF THE DRAPERS' COMPANY

The following extracts from the records of the Drapers' Company have been transcribed according to a slightly modified version of the procedures outlined in Malone Society, Collections III and V. I have not attempted to indicate deletions in the extracts, but any interlineation is indicated by half brackets, Square brackets enclose editorial interpolations. In the case of the first extract from 1621, I have lowered superscript t where this does not represent a missing letter as in the, this, etc. The hand in this entry is particularly difficult to read; the words are cramped and little care has been given to the formation of letters, especially minims. Accordingly doubtful readings and those where the text is in error have been indicated by [?].

THE INAUGURATION OF EDWARD BARKHAM, 1621

Drapers' Repertories, +301, Reverse, fos. 75-77. 25 June [sic; July?]

75] This daie M^. Edward Barkham Aldran and free of ye Companie of Lethersellers London (havinge form'ly desired to speake w'th twoe of ye M^. wardens of this Companie of drapers) declared his mynde to M^. Abbott & M^. Rosse wardens That he beinge by course to be lorde Maior of this cittie of London the next yeare, was desierous to be accepted of by this Companie as a brother thereof. And to that ende prayed ye said wardens to procure a Courte of Assistante to be furthw'th warned. & to make that his desire knowme vnto them whereby he maie before Mondaie next vnderstande of ye said Companies willingness to accepte of him of theire brotherhood or not And therevpon Mr. Meredith ye Mr of the said companie & others of ye assistante beinge furthe of London in the cuntrey weare sent for & a courte of Assistante warned againste Saterdaie ye Laste of this instant June And in ye meane tyme viz' ffrydaie in ye afternoone assembled at drapers hall, Mr. [illegible] Meredith ye Mr. of this Companie Mr. Maurice Abbott & Mr. George Lowe Twoe of ye wardens of the said Companie Mr. Aldrān Lumley, Mr. Aldrān Cotton., Mr. Io'n Raine Mr. Abraham Cartwrighte, Mr. Richard Champion, Mr. Io'n Hall & Mr. Richard Edwarde and after dispatche of other busines for w'ch they as Comitties mette togetheer The wardens Mr. Abbott & Mr. Rosse acquainted the said Comitties of ye motion & desire of the said Mr. Aldrān Barkeham And ye Mr. wardens & reste of ye p'ties before named enteringe into consideraçon of ye p'misses And findinge ye state of ye yeomandry to be very weake & ye number fewe, ye Chardge greate to ye companie of ye yeomandry if Mr. & Mr. Barkeham be of o'r companie, & ye stocke of ye yeomandry as nothinge, in respecte thereof. Consideringe alsoe the greate chardge this Companie was Latelie putt vnto by ye Maioraltie of Sr: Tho: Hayes & Sr. Io'n. Ioll[e] knight late Maiors of this citty nowe deceased & ye chardge shortlie to be expected when Mr. Aldrān Lumley & Mr Aldrān Cotten maie come to ye office of Maioraltie: and for diverse other greate consideracons & causes conceaved & propounded by ye said Comitties It was then conceaved and soe resolved as ye fitteste course then to be taken that ye said Mr. Aldran Lumley & Mr. Aldran Cotton wth Mr. warden Abbott & Mr. warden Rosse shulde repaire to the said Mr. Aldran Barkeham and acquainte him of ye companies good respecte of his love in chosinge and desiringe to come & be of o'r companie, but w'hall of o'r Companies inhabillitie to pforme & vndergoe suche chardge & busines as of necessitie they muste be enforced to be at, bothe for ye honor of this cittie & hymself when he shalbe maior, & ye creditt & w'pp of this companie, and after suche causes & reasons shewed as then was conceaved fitt to be propounded & made knowne to the said Mr. Aldran Barkeham Then to acquainte him of theire greate doubte & feare they had vppon ye meetinge of ye said courte of Assistante, such woulde be ye opynion & resolucon of that courte touchinge ye foresaid matter (as already they conceived by ye private meetinge of ye Comitties) that they muche doubted his w'pp shulde not receave suche answeare & contentm as in that matter he expected at the companie hand. And therefore earnestly to pswade his w'pp to accepte of some other of the Twelve companie as he formlie alleged to Mr. wardens offered themselves to receave him, & to spare ye saide companie of drapers in this behalf yet notw'handinge if his w'pp woulde nee vrge ye Companie of drapers to yelde him an answeare from the court of Assistante whether they are willinge to accepte him into theire companie or not, the said Mr. wardens promised on the morrowe to attende him w'th the Companies answeare in that behalf Yet further intimated to Mr. Aldran that if the courte of Assistante shall sende him a negative answere they conceaved it woulde tende in some sorte to his disgrace & doubted it woulde be much discontentfull vnto him & therefore wished the companie maie not be further vraged, but that he woulde take notice of the companies desire nowe ye matter beinge probably carryed & noe denyall given And after there beinge a courte of Assistant and the matter beinge treated vppon & debated At laste it was ordered that the ffowre Mr. wardens of this companie shulde repaire to the said Mr. Aldran Barkham and acquainte him of the companies desire to be excusde from havinge him of o'r said companie for ye respecte aforesaid And Mr. wardens that afternoone attendinge Mr. Aldran according-lie wth ye Message of ye whole courte of Assistant the said Mr.
Aldran Barkeham shewed him self thereat muche discontented accountinge himself wronged & vnkyndlie delt wth allegedginge that as he conceaved he had a righte to come vppon anie of the Companies as he thought fitt, and noe companie had a power to refuse him & uttered manie discontentfull wordes tuchinge that denyall sayinge he woulde never be Lo. Maio'r of London vnsles he weare a Draper. And the more vnwillinge the companie was to receave him vppon that companie the more earneste he woulde be to come vppon them The said Mr. wardens on the companie behalf alleged that the companie hoped he woulde not offer in anie wise to come vppon the Drapers companie, for that he made them afaithefull Dmise that in consideracion of ye Companies condiscendinge at his earnest request to suffer Mr. Paule Bayninge some tyme the companie's tenant of the howse at dowgate wherein the said Mr. Aldran Barkham nowe dwelleth to assigne over his interest & estate in that howse & other land<there> he woulde never come to be free of the Drapers companie or putt them to anie trouble or chardge what soever And that & that [sic] was a consideracion bothe Lawfull & valuable in all equitie to binde the said Mr Aldrān not to come vppon the drapers companie as aforesaid And After that ye Mr. wardens (vppon a complainte made to the Lo: Maio'r and courte of Aldrān by Mr. Aldrān Barkeham) weare sent for to the courte of Aldrān on Tuesday ye second of Iuly 1621 and vppon the companies answear & denyall in acceptinge of the said Mr. Aldrān Barkeham, the said courte vppon the rysinge thereof willed that this companie maie have a further meetinge & be entreated to accepte of the said Mr. Aldrān into this companie. But vppon ye Mr. wardens replie that o<companie conceaved they oughte not to be bounde to receave him beinge not compellable by Lawe and noe psedent order or custome beinge against them in that behalf Diverse of ye said Aldrān condiscended & said they did not see howe this companie coulde be compelled to receave him but yet wished he mighte be receaved in love & the companie called to that purpose And afterward on saterdaie the Seaventh of Iuly ye said Mr. wardens accordinglie caused to be warned to the drapers hall ye Assistant<lyvery and chiefest pte of the yeomandry (havinge firste obtained ye Lo: Maio'r's consent to call together ye whole gemanllity of the companie) and after declaracion made by ye Mr. wardens of the whole matter & pceedinges & of the desire of the Lo: Maio'r & Courte of Aldrān tuchinge the lovinge acceptance of the said Mr. Aldrān It was putt to a question whether he shulde be receaved into the companie or not & desired that everie particular person of the companie should shewe his willinge mynde thereon by ye holdinge vpp of his hande And it beinge published that all that woulde have Mr. Aldran Barkeham to be receaved into this companie shulde holde vpp theire hande, noe one hande was helde vpp for him, but beinge declared that all that woulde not have him to come into this companie to holde vpp theire hande every man helde vpp his hande, whereby all the whole companie agreed he shulde not be receaved vpon this companie The nexte courte of Aldren beinge on the tuesday followinge wch was the xth of Iuly, ye Mr. wardens reported to that courte ye companies deuises & resolucon And the said Mr. Aldran Barkeham then openly in the said courte of Aldren vowinge & protestinge that he woulde never be Mayor of London vnles he be admitted into the said companie of drapers & beinge earnest in that courte tuchinge his comynge into this Companie The said courte of Aldren then by an order of that courte declared That the said courte conceaved it [ ? ] & fittinge that this companie of drapers shulde receive the said Mr. Aldran Barkeham into this Companie And vpon the further request of the said Courte of Aldren on the behalf of the said Mr. Aldran Barkeham to the Companie to have other meetinges and further consideracons of the said matter There was diverse and seuall courte of Assistant warned & had vpon due & delibate consideracon. had of the misses & vpon due advisemt howe farr they oughte to be chardged in that behalf continually resolved to deliu to the said courte of Aldren negative answearas as by the orders of those courte appeareth And the Mr & wardens & c'ten of the Assistant of this companie to that purpose being appointed from tyme to tyme after eache of the said courte of Assistant certified the said courte of lo: Maio'r & courte of Aldren of the resolucons & mynde of the Assistant of this companie Wherevpon the said courte of lo: Maio'r & Aldren the xxiiijth of Iuly 1621 Ordered and thoughte fitt that this companie of drapers shall receave Mr. Aldran Barkeham into this companie And by that order the Mr. & wardens & the reste of the said companie p'sent were by the said courte of Aldren required to make it known to this companie & to see that order w'hall convent speed performed At w'h courte before the said order sett downe this companie beinge sent for appeared & by Mr. Gerrard theire counsell opened to the said courte All the companies reasons & causes as they had collected in wrytinge againste the receavinge in of the said Mr. Aldran And Mr. Blanchard & Mr. Humfrey Downes as witnisses for ye companie offered to depose to that courte ye promise of Mr. Aldran Barkeham not to come vppon this companie & the valuable consideracon of this companie given in respecte thereof & when all ye exceptions alledged by Mr. Recorder & others on the behalf of Mr. Aldran against or companie ware fullie & cle-relie answeared, & this companie onlie stood vppon this that there was nether Lawe, Customes, order in the pointe, or equitie to compell them to the receavinge in of the said Mr. Aldran The said company ware willed to depe the court And in theire absence The said courte of Aldren (consideringe how farr themselves had engaged & entered themselves into the busines & howe farr it maie tende to theire disreputacon, for this company to pvaile in this behalf, and seeinge that M. Aldran as clayminge in his owne righte was stopped by ye testimonies of the foresaid parties in respecte of his promise & a consideracon accepted) made the foresaid order as of the power & protractive of that courte to appointe this companie to receave the said M. Aldran, Wherevppon after at the comynge downe of the lo: keep Thet & diverse others of the Lord of his Majesty most ho. privie counsell for the ffirst paymt of the second subsidie The M. wardens of this companie waere sent for to be before the said Lo, whose appearinge at the Lo. Maior howse after dynn there beinge M. Aldran Barkeham & diverse or most of the Aldren wth M. Recorder & The wardens of this companie waere required by the said Lo & enioyned to receave in the said M. Aldran Barkeham vppon or companie, but for matter of chardge in showes or otherwise tuchinge his receavinge in when he came to be lo: Maior lefte that to the Company to doe as they themselves shall please not compellinge them to be at anie: chardge tuchinge the same /

Drapers' Company Repertories, +131, 164a

Whereas this Companie by auctoritie of the Lord of his Majesty moste ho. privie Counsell weare compelled for the receavinge of M. Aldran Barkeham into this Companie Yet ye said Lord for the matter of chardge tuchinge the triumphes expected lefte the Companie to them selves not requiringe anie performance thereof at their hande. It is ordered that the M'r. and wardens nowe to be chosen for the yeare ensewinge together w'th the nowe psent fowre M'r. wardens and w'th M'r. Cartwrighte shall repaire to y'e Courte of Lo: Maio'r and Aldr'n and move them to take suche good course for this Companies ease or fredome of the matter of chardge expected as aforesaid whereby this cittie maie not be disgraced nor this Companie occasioned to com- plaine e'll where as they w'thout pcedent have byn Complayned of/19 September, ibid., 165a.

Considerai'n Item this daie the righte w'ppfull the M'r and of y'e plotte wardens w'th M'r Raine & M'r. Abbott are entreated and devises for the Lo Maio'r's consideracon of suche plotte & thinge as are Showes referred/ offered to be psented to this Companie by several psons touchinge the pageant & shoues intended to be pformed by this Companie y'e daie as M'r. Aldr'n Barkeham is to be sworne to y'e place of Maioraltie and to report to this Courte of theire doing touchinge the same/

Drapers' Company Wardens' Accounts 1621-22, +469/6, 42.

Item paid to Edward Barkeham Lord Mayo'r by order of a Court of Assistante for y'e painting and bewtifyinge of his howse against his Mayrolye Lxv[?]j l xiij s iiijd

22] The Accompt of Thomas Adams Allan fuller Matyn Leader and Thomas Bynnion ye fower warden batchelors of ye yeomanry of ye ho:ble Company of Drapers London of all such moneys they received and paid toward the Charge of the tryumphes and showes at the inauguracon of the right ho:ble Sr Edward Barkeham knight lord Mayor of the City of London/

The Charge of this Accompte

Inprimis we charge ourselves with the receipt of CCCli from Mr William Essington ye Rentor warden of the Company of Drapers beinge parte of the moneys he had and received of diverse of the said Company for their admission into the Livery or clothinge of that Company

More received for a fyne of Rowland Griffeth to be exempted from being called upon ye Livery and from all charge and service in the yeomanry excepte for payment of his quarteridge

[Then follows a list of "Receipt of such as fyned for service," amounting to £143. 18. 00 contributed by 60 Bachelors. Next come the receipts from those "Batchellors here vnder named being xxxix in nomber that did weare ffoynes," totalling £75. 02. 00.
Finally come the contributions of the 32 "that did weare budge"; this amounted to £32. 00. 00.]

25] Total Received
Of ye M'r. wardens 300l 00 00
Of Rowland Griffeth for his fyne 013 06 08
Of ye Batchelers yt fyned 143 18 00
Of those as served in foynes 075 02 00 of those as served in Budge 032 00 00/
Total £d 564 06 08/.

26] The dischardge of this Accompt
Inprimis paid for 12 azure clothes of severall prizes viz some at viij li vs some at viij li xs and others at viij li xv s a clothe, to make poore mens gowns and coates

Item for fower yard of like cloth which was for the like vse

Item paid to Mr Thomas Middleton Garrett Christmas and Anthony Monday by Agreem't for makinge and settinge out of the Pageantc and showes viz the one in forme or likenes of a Mountaine one other of a fountaine w'th a triple Crowne a third called the tower of vertue or ye brazen tower and the fowrth a Chariott drawne w'th twoe pellited lyons and for all Chardges incident to those shewes Item to Richardson by composicion for the Charge of the greenemen and fyer worcke viij li x s and more paid him for a breakefast for himselfe and his men vj s in toto

Item paid to the trumpeters beinge xxxij in nomber for their service that day as by the Agreem t appeareth

Item paid more to some of them for goinge by water
i j s

Item paid to Iohn Harman for furnishinge ye gaallyfoyst &c accordinge to Agreement &c

Item for makinge 77 poore mens gownes and 55
Coates at xij d a peice

Item for makinge 75 payre of sleeves at ij d
the paire and for cuttinge 77 gownes and 55
Coates at ij d the paire

Item for the hyer of Colours v s and caryinge
the Auntient to the gally xij d

Item to Mr Dunne the keep of Blackwellhall his fee for his howse roome and trouble and Chardge he had w'h the Children of Pageant in dyninge at his howse

323
Item paid to Mr. Wallrond the Marshall for his fee £

Item paid to Mr. Davys the under Marshall for his fee £

Item paid to Mr. George Bell for marshalling the Company and finding his men iij li

Item given to xxxj standard bearers in that service xxxj s

Item given to 16 Beadles of the hospital for their breakfast xvjs

27] Item paid for 27 pounds weight of cheese at 3d a pound vjs ixd for 7 dozen of bread vijs a barrel of beer 8s and for potte to drinke in 8d which was provided to make all the bluee gowne men dyne in the Cellor to keepe them within the hall vntill the Companies goinge to Paules, more given then to each of ye said 75 poore men iijd a peice in money xxv s ij d in toto

Item given to 4 poore men of the Company who took paynes iij s

Item paid to 3 Antient in the service iij l i

Item to 6 Drumms & 3 fynes ix l i

Item to a Drumme boy sente from ye prince xx s and to his fife v s xxv s
Item given and allowed for scarfs viz to Mr Midleton and Mr Christmas to each of them xxij$ & to Bell xx$.

Item given to Edward Mathewes who did service to see order amongst the Company in their going and to buy him a feather.

Item paid to Lawrence y'e Lo: Mayors officer for his attendance and paynes taken about this busines in fetchinge the Company in.

Item paid to Bartholomew hobson for boatehyer to and from westminster.

Item paid to poore men of y'e Company to keepe the crowde from the Company as they goe in the street.

Item paid & given to ffludd for makinge a silke coate for y'e bardgeman and for three yard & $ of fustian.

Item paid to Richard Monday y'e painter for worck done aboute this busines as by a Bill appeareth.

Item given to the Pageantmakers to drinke when the wardens went to viewe the worck when they weare makinge.
Item paid to Thomas Iones ye fencer for his service and his 25 men ye employed for cleeringe the way and attendinge ye service of ye daie vijli vs

Item paid to John Edwards for 30 dozen of whiffling staves at iij s vjd the dozon vli xv s for the hyer of 76 Iavelyns at vjd a peice xxxvij s for 2 dozen and a halfe of trunchions at iij s the dozen x s for 8 banner staves for ye bardge at viijd a peice v s iijd more for a guilt trunchyon ijs

Item paid to william Vffington waxechaundler for 16 dozen of longe torches at xiiij s ye dozen for the Companyes service

28] Item to Grace Hawyn waxechandler for 14 dozen of longe torches at xiiij s ye dozen and 5 dozen of short torches at viijd ye dozen and 3 dozen of lincke at ijs vjd the dozen

Item paid to a straunger that drewe the forme of a Pageant for the service

Item paid for 57 dozen of watchett and yellow Ribbon at ijs viijd the dozen vijd xij s

Item paid for 4 oz of crymson in grayne and white freinge for the lo: Mayors banner at ijs ixd the oz xjs and for one oz ½ of silke iij s xiiij s Item paid to Mr Thomas Hineksman for 6 dozen and fower of rownd redd caps w'th bands at xxiiiij\s y\e dozen and for 4 dozen and 10 of lone redd caps w'th ribband at the like price of xxiiij\s the dozen the some of

Item paid to Mr Thomas Bynnion Mercer for 23 ells of taffety sarcenett at vj\s viij\d the ell vij\li xiiij\s iiij\d for three ells and a quarter of crymson in grayne ducape taffaty sarcenett at ix\s the ell for y\e lo: Mayors banner xxix\s iiij\d And for three double peeces of redd mocado lacke 5 yard\e at xxxvij\s ye double peece w'ch conteyney about 26 yard\e at about xvij\d the yarde v\i j\s iiij\d and for 13 yard\e of yellowe saye to face the Blewe coates &c at xxiiij\d the yard xxvij\s iiij\d

Item paid to Mr walrond the Marshall to paie a poore man for watching ye Pageant 7 daies

Item more to him for 2 warrant\e hee had from ye lo: Mayo\r for ye better orderinge of the busines

Item paid to Mr Walter ye Companyes Clarke w'th ye allowance & consent of the Mr wardens for his fee for his paynes taken in this busines

Item more to him for his allowance for his gowne

\vi jj\d xvij\s
\v\i x\l i
\v j\l i xiiij\s iiij\d
Item paid to Mr. Ducke the upholster for many daies worke in mendinge the Banners & givinge his attendance on ye Company on ye daie of the service

Item paid to Robert Bevis for the Chardge of 120 Chambers to be discardinged the daie lo: Mayor tooke his oathe of which 70 weare placed against westminster & 50 against St. Paules wharfe

29] Item paid to an Inkeeper in Carterlane for the trouble of his howse and for a breakefast and fyer there for the Children of the Pageant

Item paid to Garrett Christmas to paie for ye hyer of a barne in whitecrosstreete for ye tyme when ye Pageant weare makinge

Item paid to the weight howse Porters for their fee in attendinge at the guildhall

Item paid to william Weld for streamers and hyer of flagge for the gallefoyst as by his bill appeareth

Item given to the Citties weight for their fee

Item to the Clerkes man of this Company for his accustomed allowance for his paynes

Item paid to fludd the porter for his fee for his paines
Item paid to Mr. Barnard ye Beadle for his gowne.xxxiiij s and for his paynes xxx s

Item to Thomas Eaton the vnderbeadle for his hood & gowne lvj s and for his paynes xxx s

Item paid to Bartholomew Hobson for his paynes xl s

Item to Iohn Bullocke for sixe daies paynes vj s

Item to the keep of the Guildhall ye fee for hauinge Mercers hanginge at the guildhall xij s

Item paid to Mr. Snowden the vpholster for proiding hanginge for ye lo: Mayors Court old Cowncell Chamber Orphanes Court Chaires stooles Pictures and other like thinge that feaste

Item paid for papere and ye carydge: of the clothe for the gownes to and from the hall at seuall tymes xv s

Item paid to the gentlemen vshers for theire breakfast xliiiij s

Item paid for a breakfest the daie of the try: mphes for all the Batchellers xiiij li xiiij s

Item spent by ourselves at divers dynners and meetinge whilest wee sate and weare daylie ymployed in the busines xij li xvj s
Item paid to Valentyne Heyward for the hyer and Charge of two barges for ye carryinge of the Company to Westm and other chardges depending thereon

30] Item given to 3 poore men of the Company which should haue had gownes and had not

Item paid to ye Churchwardens of St Peeters church in Cheapeside for the waigaret standinge on the church porch at night when the Lord Mayor passed from Paules

Item paid to the Company Clarke for his fee in makinge vpp this Accompte

\[
\begin{array}{c}
\text{li s d} \\
\text{Total of all paym} \\
\text{548 - 04 - 00}
\end{array}
\]

\[
\begin{array}{c}
\text{li s d} \\
\text{Totall received} \\
\text{564 - 06 - 08}
\end{array}
\]

\[
\begin{array}{c}
\text{li s d} \\
\text{Totall paid is} \\ \text{548 - 04 - 00}
\end{array}
\]

\[
\begin{array}{c}
\text{li s d} \\
\text{Reste} \\
\text{016 - 2 - 8}
\end{array}
\]
A newe Liuerey to be Item yt is ordered and soe thought fitt for taken in for ye ease yeomandrys of ye yeomandry & performance of ye intended service chardge for ye Lo. Maiors Showe/ Company against the tyme of ye inawguraçon of the right woPPful Mûd Aldrân Lumley to ye place of Maioralty for ye yeare ensuine that there shalbee to ye number of eight or tenne of ye fittest and most sufficient persons of ye yeomandry of this Company selected out and admitted by the Mû wardens of this Company into ye Livery of the Company every of them payinge before hee bee admitted the accustomed fyne of xxvj li xij s iii d And that the fower Mû wardens shall take present course for ye fittinge providinge and compoundinge : for of all things as shalbee fitt and necessarie for or towchinge ye said showes and triumphes
And towchinge ye chardge to bee disbursed about ye same It is agreed that if the fynes of those that are to bee admitted into ye Livery the present stocke belonginge to ye said yeomandry and the fynes and payments to bee raised by such as shall either fyne or serve in ye same busines shall not suffice to performe the chardge of the said triumphes that then the some of Cxvj li xij s iii d nowe chardged in ye Rentor wardens Accompts and beinge a remainder of the ffynes receaved vpon ye takeinge in of ye last livery shal bee disbursed for ye purpose aforesaid/41] Paid to the two younger wardens for theire extraordinary allowance for the lord Maiors Messe v\[^{1i}\] a man in toto

43] Item given in reward to the workemen of the Pageants against my Lord Maiors Day when ye Company went to view them at Leaden hall

Item paid to the wardens of the Yeomandry CCCxx\[^{1i}\] for the fines of xij persons admitted into the livery at the rate of ffourty markes a peice by order of Court of Assistants toward the defrayinge the Chardges for the Lord Maiors showe I say paid

Item paid for bread and wine in the bardge vppon my Lord Maiors day when the Company went to westminster
Item paid to the M'r Batchellors L10 by order of Court of Assistants toward the Charge of the Lord Maiors shewe

44] Item paid my Lord Maior' the accustomed gratuity toward the trymming of his house by order of Court of Assistants

Item paid for a purse to put in the gold for which the money was exchanged to give vnto him

46] Item paid more to M'r Atkins for his attendance at the hall when divers obstinate Young men refused to pay theire fines and bee Conformable to the charge for ye Lo: Maior's Showes

1623-24, Renter's Accounts, 1623-24, 14.

ffor 2 gallons Canarie wyne & bread for the company in the barge my Lord maiors day
ffor the hyere of 2 clothes for the barge: 0 - 06 - 06

To wheatley for symon & Iudes day 0 - 00 - 06

... ... ... ... ... ... ... ... ... ... ...

1623-24, Wardens of the Bachelors' Accounts

33] The accompt of Iohn Gualter Iohn ffoster Robert Abney and Walter Coventrey the fower Wardens Batchellors of the yeomandrye of the honorable Company of Drapers London of all such moneyes as they received and paid toward the Charde [sic] of Triumphes and shewes at the Mauguracõn [sic] of the right honorable Sr Martyn Lumley Knight Lord Maior of the Citye of London./.

The chardge of this Accompt/

Inprimis wee Chardge our selves withe the receipt of CCClxx\textsuperscript{11} From Mr Henry Garrway the rentor Warden of the Company of Drapers being pte of the moneyes hee had and received of diverse of the said Company for theire admission into the liverye or Clothing of that company [Here follows (fo. 33-35) the receipts of those forty-eight bachelors who "fined for service", amounting to £98. 10. 00. Receipts from the forty-two who wore foynes totalled £122. 10. 00 and from the thirty-three who wore budge £48. 10. 00. The total receipts thus amounted to £239. 10. 00.]

36] The dischardge of this Accompt/

Blewe clothes  Inprimis paid for 13 Azure Cloathes for Gownes of severall prizes vizt some at Eight & coates pound and Tenne shillings and others

\[ Cviij li \times s \] at Eight pound a Cloath to make poore men gowmes and Coates.

Item paid to Mr. Thomas Middleton and Garret xpmas by agreement for making and setting out of the pageants and Shewes vist the one in forme or likenes of a Mountayne one other a Chariott drawne with twoe Pellited Loyons a Third a Christall Temple and the fourth a royall Canopy of state and for all Chardges incident to these shewes

\[ Cliii \]

Item paid Anthony Munday for an Argoe

\[ xxxvi f. \]

Greenemen Item paid to Iohn Walker by Composition for the ffyreworkes Chardge of the Greenemen and fyerworkes \[ viij li \times s \].
Alnutt ye M'shall/ Item. paid to Richard Allnutt for Marshalling the Company and finding his men

Gallifoyste/ Item. paid to William Guilford for furnishing a Gallyfoist according to agreement &cc^e

Trumpeto's Item. paid to the trumpetors beeing Thirtytwoe in number for theire service that day as by the Agreement Appeareth xxvjlii and given them to drinke twoe shillings & sixpence in tot:

Item. paid to Eaton and Hobson for boate higher to & from westminste'

Item. given to a boy whoe should have beene a drumer but was disapointed

Item. paid for the portradge of 12 azure Clothes to draps hall

Item. paid to Richard Rudd for 3 ells and % of Crymeson in grayne Taffaty sarcenett for the Lord Maio's Banner

Item. paid him more for xxvj ells of Taffaty sarcenett watchet and yeallowe at six shillings & Eight pence the ell for scarfes
Item paid and given to Bell and Mabb for their often attendance Concerning a Price

Item paid and allowed to Davys the Marshall in lieu of his scarf

Item to Mr. Monday and his Partner for the like Item paid to Mr. Monday's man for bringing the books

Item given to Mr. Monday's men to drink when the wardens went to view the Argoe when it was making

Item paid to the Gally's foist men to drink and boatehyer

Item paid to Mr. Dunne the keep of Blackwell hall his fee for his house Roome and trouble hee had with the Children of the Pageants in dinging at his house

Item given to 16 Beadles of the Hospitalls for their breakfasts

Item given to eleven poore men of the Company which should have had gowmes but hade none

374. 1. 5
37] Item paid to Mr Middleton for the making of a Breakefast and fyer for the Children of ye Pageants

Item paid to Garrett Christmas for the hiring of boardes to make a place for ye making of ye Pageants in &c

Item paid to Mr Monday for the hyer of a barne in Whitecrossestreete to make the Argoe

Item paid to a little boy a drumer of the Argoe

Item to a fiffe for the Argoe

Item to a little boy a drumer in Middletons shewes

Item to watermen for Carryeing the gentlemen vshers to and from westminster

Item paid to Mr Wallrond the Marshall for his fee

Item paid to Mr Davys the vnder Marshall for his fee

Item to 3 Antients in the service

Item paid to Myne drumes and fouer fiffes

Item to a waterman for carryeing the wardens men to and from westminster

Item to a drumme boy sent from my Lord Maio'r
Item to seaven poore men of the Company whoe kept the Crowde from the Company as they went in the streets } vij$^s$

Item paide to Hobson for boatehier to & from Westminster } iiiij$^s$

Item paide to the waighesthouse Porters for theire fee in Attending at the Guildehall } xx$^s$

Item paid to fower men for the cutting out of Nyntyre gownes and three score Coats } xxxij$^s$

Item paid to Iohn Terry the paynter for workes done about this busines as by his bill appeareth } vijli iiiij$^s$

Item paid to y e M'. Porters of Blackwelle hall for their fee } xx$^s$

Item paid to Thomas Lawrence the Lord Maior$^s$ officer for his attendance & great paynes taken about this buiñses in fetching the Company in } x1$^s$

Item paid to Thomas Iones the fencer for his service and his 25 men hee impoyed for Clearing the waye and attending the service of the day } viijli v$^s$

Item paid to M'. Downes for y e higher of twoe Bardge cloathes } vj$^s$ viij$^d$
Item given to the Cityyes waigthes for theire fee

Item paid to M'r Ducke for making the banner and doeing other workes as by his bill Appeareth

Item paid to M'r Thomas Bynnyon for three peeces of redd Mocado which conteyned about Nyne yard & a halfe at xxxvij s a peece and for 14 yeard & a halfe of yeallowe say

Item paid to 39 gentlemen vshers for theire dinners

Item paid the Trumpetors toward theire dinner

38] Item paide the Ioyner for making the Pavyses and other workes as by his bill Appeareth

Item paid to Iohn ffoster for 77 douzen of watchett and yeallowe Ribbon at ij s viijd the douzen and for fower ownces lack three drames of fringe for the Lord: Maio's Banner at three shillings the ounce

Item paid to William Weld vpholster for making ensignes and Antients with the companyes armes in them for the Gallafoyst as by his bill Appeareth
Item paid William Vffington 'Grace Hardwyrk' Bartholomew Hitch and Thomas Swayne waxchaundlers for 32 dozen of great torches at xiiij d a dozen. 8 dozen of Small torches at viij d the dozen and foure dozen of Lincks at ij d the dozen in toto

Item given to 34 standard bearers

Item for making Nynty gownes and three score
Coates at xijd a peice

Chambers Item paid to Robert Beuys for the Chardge of Cxtye Chambers to bee dischardged the day the Lord Maior tooke his oath of which 70 weare placed against westminster and 50 against Paules wharfe

Item spent by our selves at diverse dinners and meetings whilst we satt and weare dayly imployed in the busines

Item given to Mr Sheffeilde brother a poore man of this Company in leiwe of a gowne promised him

Item to William Rushton for the like Item paid to Valentyne Heyward for the hyer and Chardge of twoe Bardges for the Carryeing of the company to Westminster and other Chardges depending thereon

\[ \text{vij li iiij s} \]

Item paid for a Breakefast the day of the Triumphes for all the Batchellors

\[ \text{xv li xviij s} \]

Item paid to Mr Atkins the Lord Maior's officer for his Attendance at the hall

\[ \text{x s} \]

Item given to Mr Christmas men when the wardens went to see the Pageants

\[ \text{v s} \]

Item paid to Mr Walter the companyes Clarke with the allowance and consent of the Mr Wardens for his fee for his Paynes taken in this busines

\[ \text{x li} \]

Item more to him for his allowance for his gowne

\[ \text{vij li xiiij s iiiij d} \]

Item paid to Mr Barnard the Beadle for his gowne xxxiiij s and for his paynes xxx s

\[ \text{iiij li iiiij s} \]

Item paid for the printing of many severall ticketts for the warning of the yeomandrye

\[ \text{xxviiij s iiiij d} \]
Item to Thomas Eaton the vnder beadle for his hood and gowne LviS and for his extraordinarye paynes xxxvS intoto

Item paid to Bartholomewe Hobson for his paynes xlS

Item paid to fflood the Porter for his paynes xS

154. 10. 10

39] Item paid to Mr Snowden the upholster for providing hangings for the Lord Maiors Court old Counsell Chamber Orphans Court Chayres stooles Pictures and other like things that feast xlS

Item paid the Clarkes man the accustomed allowance for his paynes in the buispåes xxS

Item paid Mr Hicks man for cappes at xxiiijs the dozen xvli vjs

Item paid Iohn Edward for staves ixli xjd

Item for a barrell of Beere vjd

Item paid 90 Poore men Carryeing Torches xxxS

Item paid to the Porter of Heralls Hall when diverse of the Company were there vS
Item to Thomas Eaton for bread and Cheese for ye Poore men for theire dinner

Item paid to Mr Walter the Clarke the vsuall Allowance to make vpp the Accompt

Item given Mathewe Eemere a poore man disappointed of a gowne

Item paid to the Churchwardens of St Peeters in westcheape the ordinarye allowance for suffering the Cityyes waights to bee vppon the leads over theire Church porch when the Lord Maio and his bretheren came from Paules the 29th of October

Item paid to the Keeper of the guildhall the vsuall allowance or fee for having and hanging vpp the Company of Mercers hangings in and about the Guilde hall at the Lord Maio's feast

Item paid for fower yeardo and a halfe of blewe cloth which was provided for a blewe Gowne to give vnto Richard Trott the companyes Butler

\[ \text{xix}^{s} \text{ ix}^{d} \]

\[ \text{x1}^{s} \]

\[ \text{ij}^{s} \]

\[ \text{iij}^{s} \text{ iiij}^{d} \]

\[ \text{xij}^{s} \]

\[ \text{xxx}^{s}. \]
The total received is 639: 10: -
The total paid is 629: 9: 2
Reste 010: 0: 10 d.
Draper's Repertories, +131, 201.

The complete entry for 20 September is reprinted in MSC III, 108-9. The greater part of the entry for 13 October is also reprinted there; the remainder runs:

...the same shalbe supplyed and disbursed out of this Companyes moneys by ye Rentor warden or ye Rentor as this Courte shall appointe.

11 December, ibid. +131, 202\(^a\)

It is ordered that ye Rentor warden shall pay and present to ye righte Honorable ye Lord Maior our Mr ye some of one hundred Mark as ye accustomed allowance of this Company toward ye bewtifiinge of his howse prouided for this tyme of Maioraltie/

Mr Middleton & Mr

Christmas referred to the Wardene for their demand: touchinge the pageant:

Item the paymente of Mr Middleton and Mr. Christmas for ye Pageant and of others for ye firewerk and providinge of Chambers beinge hetherto putt of in regard of the ill performance thereof is nowe referred to ye wardens Batchellors of this Company whoe are willinge to compound and agree with the parties the best they may giving them contentmente as ye busines shall deserve and as shall be fitt ye creditt of this Company.

Wardens of the Bachelors' Accounts 1615-1691, +178, 49-55

49] The Accompte of Nathaniell Downes Andrewe Cade Robert Estrey and Andrewe Beeche the fower warden batchello's of the yeomandry of the Honoble Company of Drapers London of all such moneys as they receaved and paid toward the charde of ye triumphes and Showes at the inauguracion of the Right honorable Cuthbert Hackett Lord Maior of the City of London./

The Chardge of this Accompte

Inprimis wee chardge our selves with the Receipte of Clxxli from Mr william Garway the Rentor Warden of the Company of Drapers beinge moneys he re­ ceaved of diverse of the saide Company for their admission in to the livery or Clothinge of that Company

Item wee chardge our selves with the some of Clxxvjjli jd by vs receaved of the precedent wardens batchellors restinge due vpon the foote of theire Accompte
Item more Received of Mr. Wagstaffe his fine for being dispensed with his place beinge warden of the yeomandry the some of \[ \text{xiiij li vjs viijd} \]

Total supra \[ \text{CCClix li vjs ixd} \]

[Here follows (fo. 49-51) the receipts from the twelve Bachelors who 'fined for service,' amounting to £22. Contributions from the fifty-four who wore foons totalled £107. 19. 00 and from the fifty-two who wore budge £52. Together with £20 from the Lord Mayor for the Bachelors' supper, the 'Total of Moneys Receaved to be disbursed for & aboute ye Tryvmphes for ye Lo. Maio' amounted to £551. 05. 09.]

52] The Discharge of this Accompte

Inprimis payd for 13 Azure Clothes at seuall prices to make poor mens gownes and Coate the some of \[ \text{Cxi li xvjs} \]

Item paid to Mr. Thomas Middleton and Garrett Christmas by agreement for makinge and setting out of ye Pageant and Shewes viz the one in the likenes of a beutfull Hill, one other a Charriott of Honor drawen with twoe pellited lions a third a Sanctuary of prosperitie the fowerth a fountaine of virtue and all chardges incident to theis Shewes the some of \[ \text{Cxxv li} \]

Item paide to Richard Iones for the chardge of ye Greenemen and fier worke

Item paide to him more for the Chardge of Cxi tie Chambers to be dischardged the day the Lord Maio tooke his oathe Of wch seaventie weare placed against westminster and seaventie againste Paules wharffe

Item paide to Richard Alnutt for Marshallinge the Company and findinge his men

Item paide to Tilberry Strange for furnishinge a Gallyfoist accordinge to agreement

Item payde to the Trumpeto's beinge 32 in nomber for their service that day as by agreemente appeare the xxvj li and given them to drinke ij s vjd in toto

Item paide to Thomas Iones the ffencer for his service and eighte men he imployed for clearinge the way and attendinge the service of the day

Item paid to william ffox for six dromes and three ffiffes

Item given to the Citties waight for their fee
Item payde to Iohn Terry the Paynter for worke done aboute this busines as by his bill appeareth

\[ ii j^{\ d} x v i j^{\ s} \]

Item payd to M\(^r\) Bruerton Silkeman for six ell\(\text{c}\) of Taffity at Sixe shilling\(\text{e}\)\(\text{vij}\)d\(\text{l}\) the ell and for eighteenell\(\text{e}\) of sarcenett at five shilling\(\text{e}\) and eighte peence the ell for to make Scarffes

\[ v i j^{\ l} i j^{\ s} \]

Item paide to the Officer for warninge in M\(^r\) wagstaffe at seuerall tymes

\[ i j^{\ s} \]

Item payde to william Piddocke the Lord Maio\(^r\)s Officer for his attendance at the Hall and paines in fetchinge in of the Companie

\[ x l^{\ s} \]

Item paide to M\(^r\) Bynnion for three ell and a quarter of Crymson taffitie at xiij\(^{\ s} x d\) the ell for the Lord Maio\(^r\)s Banner iij\(^{\ l} v^{\ s}\) and for three peeces of Red Moccadoe at xxxvj\(^{\ s}\) the pheece vlij viij\(^{\ s}\) and five yard\(\text{e}\) three quarters more of Redd Mocado at xvijd the yard, viij\(^{\ s} i j^{\ d}\). to make sleeves for y\(e\) poore mens gownes. And xvij\(^{\ s}\)teene yard\(\text{e}\) and one quarter of yallowe say at xxiiijd the yard xxxiij\(^{\ s} j^{\ d}\) and one yard and a halfe of Redd say at ijs iiiijd the yard, iij\(^{\ s} v j^{\ d}\) to face the poore blewe Coat\(\text{e}\) in toto

\[ C C C l v j^{\ l} i x^{\ s} x^{\ d} \]
Item paid to Mr Crowthe for Ribbyn for ye companies Cullors and ffringe for the Banners viz for twelve pieces of iiiijd fine watchett and yallowe Ribbyn and twoe ounces and a half of watchett and white nayle deepe ffringe, twoe ounces and a halfe one quarter and penny waighte of Crymson in graine and white ffreinge at ijs ixd the ounce and twoe peec of watchett and yallowe 4d fine Ribbyn xiiijs in toto

Item paide to Christofer Dragge and Grace Harding waxchaundlers for twenty and five dozen of longe and fower dozen of shorte Torches

Item payd to them for five dozen of Torches at twelve shilling and six peence the dozen

Item payde to Mr Edward for Staves

Item payde to Mr. Dun the Keeper of Blackewellhall his fee for his howse Roome and trouble he had with the Children of the Pageant in dyninge at his howse

Item payd to the Porters of Blackewell Hall for theire fee

Item payde to Mr Davis the Marshall for his fee
Item payde to Mr. Pordishe ye vnder Marshall for his fee

Item payde to the waigehowse porters for theire fee in attendinge at the Guildhall

Item given to the Beadel of the Hospitalls for theire breakefaste

Item paide to Mr. Hicksman for Capps Longe and ffllatt xxiiiij® the dozen

Item payd to Mr. Walter the Companies Clarke with the allowance and consent of the Mr wardens for his fee for his paynes taken in that busines

Item payd more vnto him for his allowance for his gowne

54] Item paide to Mr. Ducke for mendinge the Banners and doinge the workes as by his bill appeareth

Item paide to Thomas Leverett Ioyner for mendinge the targatt® and other thinges

Item paid to the Clark® man the accustomed allowance for his paynes in the busines Item payd to Thomas Eaton beadle for his hood and gowne lvj^s and for his extraordinari paines xxxv^s in toto

Item paid to M'r Snowden the Vphoulster for puidinge Hanginge for ye Lord Maior's Courte and Councell Chamber and Orphane Courte Chayres stooles Pictures and other like thinge in ye Guildhall at that ffeste

Item paid to M'r Valentine Hayward for the hyer and charde of twayne bardges for the careiinge of the Companie to westminster and other Bardge [sic; i.e. charges] depending thereon

Item paid to M'r Walter the Clarke the vsuall allowance to make vpp the Accompte

Item paid for a breakefaste the day of the Tryumph for all the Batchello's

Item paid to severall Gentlemen Vshers for theire dynners

Item given to M'r Christmas men when the wardens went to see the Pageant

Item payd to severall men for theire boate hyer to and from westminster
Item payd to three Aunciente in ye service

Item payd and spent when the wardens went to viewe the Gallyfoiste

Item spent by our selves at diuerse dynners and meetinge whilst wee sate and weare dayly ymployed in the busines

Item payd to fower men for cuttinge out of the poore mens gownes and Coat

Item payd to severall men for makinge vpp gownes and Coat

Item payd more to Mr Pidocke for warninge of Mr Hodges and Mr Oak which was bated to them

Item paid to Mr Barnard wife for seaven dozen and seaven paire of redd sleeues makinge

55] Item paid to the Standerd bearers

Item paid to the Porter of the Harroll Hall when diuerse of the Company were there

Item paid to a littell boy a drumer in the Showe Item paid to Barnard for his pains for warninge men in

Item payd to Richard Downes a poore man of this Companie

Item payd to Mr Trott for his attendance

Item payd to Richard Iames one of the Vshers for his goinge to and from westminster by water

Item payd to nyne poore men of the Company whoe kepte the Crowde from of the Company as they went in the street

Item payd to Mr Trott for beare and Cheese for the poore men for their dynners

Item payd to Isaacke Ieffery the Companies baker for bredd

Item payd to Mr Barnard for Candel

Item payd to a Smyth for openinge the locke of a box in the greate Cheste in the ladyes Chamber

Item payd for makinge of twoe keys for twoe Cheste standinge in the Ladies Chamber Item paid to the Keeper of the Guildhall the usual allowance and fee for having and hanging up the Company of Mercers hanging in and about the Guildhall at the Lord Mayors feast.

Item paid to John Fletcher for his dinner.

Item paid to Andrew Johnson and William Arkinstall for their going to and from Westminster by water and for their dinners.

Item paid to Mrs. Barnard for scowring the Pewter and making the house and Candlestick at the Supper for the Batchelor's.

Item paid to the Church wardens of St. Peter's in West Cheape the ordinary allowance for suffringer the City's weight to be upon the lead over their Church porch when the Lord Mayor and his Brethren came from Paul's.

Item paid for allowance of a blue Clothe which was returned.
Md: this j\text{l}i xix s viij d is not allowed by the Accomptant the xx\text{l}i is allowed being before charged to ye accompt

according to ancient Custome

Item paid the charge of a Supper for ye batchelors the some of xx\text{j}li xxj li xix s viij d whereof allowed by my Lord Maior
the some of twenty pounds

xxviij li xj s iiij d.

Total Received
Total paid out
Reste
Appendix III

Mr. G. R. Proudfoot of King's College, London, who has recently examined the MS and transcript of An Invention, suggests the following readings:

4  h\textbf{ble} \rightarrow h\textbf{ble}.

13  he \rightarrow this

22  \text{(Cr[est]}) \text{ C([e..])}

31  F\text{(ortui)n(iae)} \rightarrow F\text{(ortuniae)}

32  [This hono\textbf{rd}] \rightarrow [This h\text{(ono)rd}

40  \text{(appeere)} \rightarrow a[p...]

70  [Beleeve]\rightarrow \text{ third letter}

80  g\text{(o1)den} \rightarrow g\text{(o1)den}

He also points out that in three places T. erased a first thought and wrote over it.

22  \text{[worth]}

51  \text{[A christian]}

98  \text{[wicked deafe]} where "[blind]" was interlined above before being erased.