The Cariboo Road

THE CARIBOO ROAD in British Columbia is without exaggeration one of the wonders of the world. Parts of this old thrilling highway may still be seen from the main line of Canadian Pacific in the Fraser Canyon near Chaumox.

News of gold on the Fraser, reached the "outside" in February 1858. Gold-seekers rushed into New Caledonia, and in September 10,000 men were working the river-bars near Yale. The day of the fur-trader was definitely over, and New Caledonia became the Crown Colony of British Columbia on November 19th. Another year, and prospectors had clambered up the precipitous canyon of the Fraser as far as Fort George. By 1861, the Cariboo gold-rush was on. Miners swarmed in like ants, and roaring, lawless camps sprung up almost overnight at the end of a terrible trail—600 miles of peaks, cliffs and wild rapids in length. To bring law and order to these communities, Governor Douglas built the Cariboo Road.

It was completed in 1865, one of the finest roads then built. Fourteen feet wide, it ran up the Fraser Canyon from Yale to Ashcroft, and then north through the jumbled peaks to Barkerville in the heart of the Cariboo. All the gold-mad world travelled it in the sixties and seventies. Uncounted millions in gold went out to Yale, over its spidery bridges. Stages thundered down its breathless descents and went spinning around its hairpin bends, hundreds of feet above the tumbling waters. In and out, day and night, went lazy mule-trains, teams of plodding oxen, in long ambling lines, passing one another on peaks, in the echoing canyon, on the sheer cliffs, all coming and going to the magic of the gold of Cariboo.

The Cariboo Road was to British Columbia of those early days what the Canadian Pacific was to be to Canada in later years, the main artery of travel and commerce and an actual bond of union.
