SKILL—and BEAUTY

Engineering skill accepted one of the greatest challenges offered by uncompromising geography when the Canadian Pacific Railway pierced the 600 miles of spectacular mountain terrain that constitutes the Canadian Rockies.

Survey parties had little time or inclination for scenic beauties. Their thoughts were of economical levels, safe and sure gradients, constant service.

But the route thus scientifically selected, as must any in this scenic wonderland, turned out to be one of almost breath-taking beauty. Rushing, tumbling waters of myriad mountain streams; mighty peaks of eye-filling majesty; the deep colours of shadow-striped valleys—all this is the engineers' legacy enjoyed by the traveller.

Thanks to the engineering skill that pierced the Rockies, fast, modern, comfortable trains cross what was once a mountain barrier on schedules planned so that none of this beauty need be missed.
