SURVEY COMPLETED.

One per cent. Grade Secured From Carmi to Penticton.

Carry's Party from West Hastening Down Trout Creek.

R. A. Henderson, C. E., and party, left Wednesday morning for Keremeos where they will take train to their homes at Grand Forks, having completed the location of the old railway survey line between Midway and Penticton.

For the past three weeks the party, comprising about a dozen men, have been rushing work on the portion of line between Carmi and Penticton, and while some of the men have been in town for supplies every day or two, the most profound secrecy has been observed as to its operations. However, a number of suggestions have leaked out, among them being that it is not improbable that the party, in increased numbers, may be back within a month, and that next summer Penticton will be the base of extensive operations. Chief Henderson intimated to one person in conversation that Penticton would yet be a large city. Before the party left they made arrangements for the storing of their outfit, and also made enquiries as to the cost of supplies.

It is understood that a one per cent. grade has been secured, the most difficult portion of the route being the descent from the divide near the head of Ellis creek to Penticton. In order to make the grade, a distance of seventy miles is traversed between Carmi and Penticton, which are situate only twenty-one miles apart. Descending Ellis creek to near Campbell & Kay's sawmill, the survey line turns up Penticton creek, passing around the mountain and emerging through the draw at C. F. Randolph's place. It then runs south along the west side of the mountain, and crosses Penticton creek near H. L. DeBeck's farm, from which point it gradually descends to the flat.

The party under H.E. C. Carry which has been working all summer between Nicola and Okanagan Lake are now reported pushing their survey down Trout creek, and may be expected to arrive in Penticton any day. the next move will be watched with interest.

Vernon Police Protect Sharpers.

Receive Money; Then Send Letter of Introduction to Kelowna Officer.

On Monday Provincial Constable Tooth received a despatch from the Provincial Constable at Kelowna to arrest two alleged thieves and pickpockets en route from Vernon where they had been present at the Vernon Exhibition. Accordingly, when the Str. Okanagan arrived the two men were promptly taken in charge. They had not been allowed to land at Kelowna, but after the steamer left that point a charge of stealing a jack-knife at Vernon had been made, in consequence of which came the message to make the arrest.

The two men, who were traveling under the names Stanley and Barnett, expressed their willingness to be taken back to Kelowna or Vernon. The constable, therefore, in compliance with orders received that evening, conducted them to Kelowna on the following morning. After a thorough investigation, it was found that there was no evidence to incriminate them, and they were in consequence released at Penticton that evening.

While here Stanley and Barnett unfolded a tale to a representative of the PRESS, which, if true, and there seems no reason to doubt their story, should result in a general house-cleaning in the city police department at Vernon. They stated that about twenty sharpers from St. Paul and other eastern American cities conducted about ten gambling devices upon the grounds at the Vernon Exhibition. The men, together with two others, known as Irish Mike and McJimsey, ran one affair in which, according to their explanation, it was impossible for the player to win if the operator did not wish him to. All the games were allowed to run for the first day, after which, as a result of public opinion, all closed with the exception of the one run by the four named. They cleaned up about six hundred dollars and then a quarrel started about the division of the spoils. Stanley and Barnett were, they state, done out of their share, and Police Edwards and Night Watchman Bailey took the part of Irish Mike. They had even encouraged the game, so said the informers, and had permitted it, not only upon the grounds, but upon the street of the city in the evening and later in the Okanagan Hotel. Barnett said that he, personally, had given Night Watchman Bailey seven dollars and a half, and the other three had made the sum up to about twenty-five dollars. He also said that he had seen Irish Mike pass Police Edwards money, and that, in all, Edwards had received between ninety and one hundred dollars. Irish Mike and special constable Greggs drove to Kelowna on Monday to take in the exhibition at that place and Irish Mike bore with him a letter addressed to Constable Kitson, of Kelowna, and signed by Police Edwards. The letter said that any favor shown to Irish Mike would be appreciated, as he was a gentleman. Police Kitson, we were informed, has this letter in his possession.

The same set of gambling booths were opened at Kelowna, but were promptly closed by the Provincial Constable; and the citizens of that city were saved at least two thousand dollars. Stanley and Barnett claim that the total receipts of all the stands at Vernon would be between three and five thousand dollars.

There are a few questions that the city police of Vernon might be asked to answer: Why did Police Edwards permit Irish Mike and his confederates to continue their "sure thing" game after the others had closed? Why did he and Watchman Bailey sanction and even encourage that game? Why did Edwards side with Irish Mike against Stanley and Barnett after first telling them to settle their own quarrel? Why did he give Irish Mike a letter to Police Kitson? Why did special constable Greggs accompany the party of gamblers to Kelowna?

Tupper—Bowell.

At the residence of the bride, Sapperton, B. C. at 11 a. m. Sept. 23, Emma Louisa, second daughter of the late Robt. Bowell, formerly of Armstrong, was united in marriage to J. F. Tupper, of Penticton.

Owing to a recent bereavement in the bride's family, the wedding was quiet, only immediate relatives of the contracting parties were present. The bride who was given away by her uncle, Rev. J. P. Bowell, bursar of Columbian College, looked lovely dressed in while point desprit, wore veil and orange blossoms, and carried a boquet of asters and carnations. She was attended by her sister Alice, also beautifully dressed in white and carrying a similar boquet. The groom was attended by Steven Bowell, brother of the bride.

The ceremony was performed by Rev. Jas. Turner, an old friend of the family A dainty lunch was then served, after which the happy couple left by the Great Northern train for Vancouver, taking boat for Victoria for their honeymoon.

The bride is a great favorite among a large circle of friends in Sapperton, while the groom is one of the most popular young men in Penticton. Mr. and Mrs. Tupper were the recipients of a large number of beautiful presents. They will take up their residence on Ellis St., Penticton. At home to friends after Oct. 20.

A number of boys made themselves obnoxious last Sunday evening by creating a disturbance in the vicinity of Steward's hall while Baptist service was being conducted. Better be careful boys, as the law provides a heavy penalty for disturbing church services.

There will be a meeting in the room above Wade's store next Monday evening, 28th inst., for the purpose of organizing an aquatic association. All who are interested in the enterprise are requested to be present. It is well to start in at this season of the year so that everything may be fully in hand by next spring.

Thos. MacLean, of the Pacific Coast Lumber Co., spent a few days in Penticton this week, guest of Mrs. S. J. Bradshaw. Mr. MacLean is located at the north of Vancouver Island and is now on his holidays. This was his first visit to the Okanagan, and he is much pleased with the country, especially with Penticton.

What came very near proving a fatal accident occurred at the rifle range last Saturday. A squared piece of timber lying on top of the rifle butt, behind which George Kent was marking, was struck by a bullet. The bullet was turned down by a knot with the result that it passed behind the butt striking Mr. Kent on the jaw, grazing the bone and coming out at the chin. Fortunately, a scar will be the only evil result; but this should prove a warning to see that things are safe hereafter.

COMMUNICATIONS

(We do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions of correspondents.)

To the Editor of THE PENTICTON PRESS:

DEAR SIR,—I noticed in the last issue of the PRESS four different applications to lease parts of the lake foreshore. Since the first notice to apply for a lease appeared in your columns about a month ago I have been waiting to see if the Board of Trade or other responsible body were likely to take the matter up.

Nearly everyone I have spoken to on the subject seemed to regard the matter in a rather nonchalent sort of way or expressed the opinion that somebody ought to do something and then evidently dismissed the subject from their minds as a thing that did not concern them.

Very few of our people have yet realized what these applications mean and I think it is high time that their attention was drawn to the fact that the eyes of the land grabber are turned on our splendid stretch of beach which all admit is the one great attraction Penticton at present possesses over other lake towns. Now what is going to happen if these leases are granted? Only this, that before next summer the only public part of the lake shore will be the street ends, all the rest will most probably be fenced in with barbed wire fences put up by such public spirited citizens as the four gentlemen who are at present making application to lease the lake front from the mouth of Penticton Creek nearly to Main street.

There is another aspect to this question, and that is: What do these applicants intend doing when the Okanagan river is dredged and the lake lowered? I take it for granted that they will then apply for more foreshore rights and so on ad libitum.

Before concluding I would like to suggest that a petition signed by all who are interested in the future welfare of the town be forwarded through one of our members to the Minister of Lands and Works asking him to refuse the applications for leases, and so save the beach and foreshore for the public, especially the children.

Trusting you will be able to find space for this letter in your next issue.

I am yours very sincerely,

The Plow Woman

By ELEANOR GATES,

Author of "The Biography of a Prairie Girl."

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY McCLURE, PHILLIPS & COMPANY.

The outcast laid aside his rubbing stone and strove to quiet them. But the sudden commotion under the roof had already attracted the young officer. Stooping, he caught a glimpse of Squaw Charley.

"Oh, there you are!" he exclaimed and motioned for him to come forth.

When the Indian appeared, the deerskin in his arms, Lieutenant Fraser pointed toward the entrance. "You come with me," he said, with a gesture in the sign language.

Squaw Charley moved slowly along with him. No one was in sight in the inclosure—no one seemed even to be looking on. But, opposite Brown Mink's lodge, the old woman dashed out, seized the hide with a scream of rage and dashed back again. The next moment Charley passed through the sliding panel and took up his march to headquarters.

"So this is your last wild pet, eh, Robert?" said Colonel Cummings as they entered. He backed up to his stove and surveyed Squaw Charley good naturedly. "Let me see, now. You've run the scale from a devil's darning needle to a baby wolf. Next thing, I suppose, you'll be introducing us to a youngish rattlesnake."

Lieutenant Fraser rumpled his hair sheepishly. "But you ought to see the way they're treating him—banging him around as if he were a dog."

"H'm. He certainly doesn't look strong."

"They work him to death, colonel."

The commanding officer laughed. "A redskin working must be a sight for sore eyes."

"But they don't feed him, sir."

The outcast, wrapped close in his blanket, lifted his pinched face to them.

"How'd it happen I didn't notice this fellow during the march?" inquired the colonel, a trifle suspiciously.

"He was with the squaws when there was anything to do, but when we were on the move he fell to the rear."

"Didn't try to get away?"

"No. Just straggled along."

"Ah! Do you know whether or not he took part in the fight the day we captured them?"

At the question a swift change came over Squaw Charley. He retreated a little and bent his head until his chin rested upon his breast.

Lieutenant Fraser threw out his arm in mute reply. No feathers, no paint, no gaudy shirt or bonnet marked the Indian as a warrior.

The elder man approached the silent, shrinking figure not unkindly. "And what do you want me to do for him, Robert?" he asked.

Lieutenant Fraser sprang forward eagerly, his face shining. "He's so quiet and willing, sir—so ready to do anything he's told, I'd be grateful if you thought you could trust him outside the stockade. He could get the odds and ends from the bachelor's mess."

"I'll be hanged, Robert!" cried his superior, annoyed. "Most men, just out of West Point, have an eye to killing redskins, not coddling 'em."

The other crimsoned. "I'm sorry you look at it that way, colonel," he said. "I'm ready to punish or kill in the case of bad ones. But—you'll pardon my saying it—I don't see that it's the duty of an officer to harm a good one."

Squaw Charley raised his head and shifted timidly from foot to foot.

"Well, Robert," said Colonel Cummings quietly, "you still have the eastern view of the Indian question. However, let me ask you this: Has this man a story, and what is it? For all you know, he may deserve being 'hanged around.'"

Lieutenant Fraser was shaking his head in answer when swift came one from the pariah. He searched in his bosom, under the tattered waist, drew out the rag bound paper and handed it to the commanding officer.

Very carefully the latter read it, his interest growing with every line. Finally, giving it over to the lieutenant, he smiled at Squaw Charley.

"That tells the tale," he said. "I knew the man that wrote that when I was with Sibley in Minnesota, the summer after the massacre. He's a man that writes the truth. He talks the truth, too, and I wish I had him here now, so that he could interpret for me."

"Why, sir," exclaimed the younger men, "it says this chap knows English!"

"By all the gods! Of course it does, Robert, I'll make him my interpreter." The colonel strode up and down in his excitement, pausing only to contend with the other for the paper. "Red Moon," he said at last, motioning the pariah forward, "do you know what I am saying to you?"

Squaw Charley nodded.

"Good, good! This is fortunate. Now we can have a talk with these Sioux." He addressed the Indian again. "And you speak English?" he asked.

There was a second grave nod.

"You shall be my interpreter, Red Moon. You shall have a log house near the scouts, and the great father at Washington will pay you. You shall have double rations for yourself and your squaw, and more if you have papooses. What do you say to that?"

Squaw Charley had not taken his eyes from the other's face for an instant while he was talking. Now, for answer, he shook his head slowly and sadly from side to side.

"Don't want to?" cried the colonel.

"I'll tell you, sir," interposed Lieutenant Fraser, studying the paper. "I don't believe he ever speaks. You'll notice that it says here, 'but he has never.' I can't be sure, but I think the next word is 'spoken.'".

"Vow of silence?"

"Something of the kind. Captain Oliver has been telling me about these bucks that are degraded, and I don't believe that, even if this fellow spoke, the rest of the tribe would treat with us through him."

"That's probably true."

"They've made a squaw of him, sir."

Deep humiliation instantly showed in the pariah's eyes and posture. He looked at Lieutenant Fraser imploringly and drew his blanket still more closely about him. Then, as with a sign he was bidden to put it off, he suddenly let it drop to the floor.

"Great Scott!" cried the colonel. "He's dressed like one!"

"His punishment, sir. And he won't be taken back as a warrior till he does some big deed."

"What does that paper say again? 'Out of the weakness of the flesh he wept under the tortures of the sun dance.' So that's the cause of his trouble! What did they do to you, Red Moon?"

To reply Squaw Charley quickly divested himself of the calico waist and turned about. And Colonel Cummings, uttering his horror, traced with tender finger the ragged, ghastly seams that lined the pariah's back.

"Muscles torn loose," he said. "Not old wounds either." As Squaw Charley resumed waist and blanket he looked on pityingly.

"I'll give him his freedom," he said when the outcast stood ready to depart. "He can come and go in the post as he likes. Robert, see that the adjutant understands my order. Now let him get something to eat in the kitchen."

When Squaw Charley's hunger had disappeared before the enforced and rather nervous generosity of Colonel Cummings' black cook and Lieutenant Fraser had left him he hurried away from headquarters. Making his way to the sentry line north of Brannon, he gathered firewood along the Missouri until dark.

The lantern had been out for an hour in the cottonwood shack. Father and daughters were asleep. But at the end of that time Dallas was suddenly awakened by the sound of loud stamping and rending in the lean-to. Ben and Betty, roused by the fear of something, were plunging and pulling back on their halter ropes. Startled, her heart beating wildly, the elder girl crept softly to the warped door.

Her father and sister still slept, undisturbed by the noise in the stable, which now quieted as abruptly as it had begun. Dallas heard the team begin to feed again. And from outside the shack there came only a faint rustle. Was it the uncovered meadow grass of the eaves as the wind brushed gently through it or the whisper of moccasins on snow?

Later, when Squaw Charley entered the sliding panel of the stockade, he crept noiselessly toward the shingle roof. But he was not to gain it unseen. Afraid-of-a-Fawn, who had been looking about for him, hailed him savagely as he neared.

"Wood for the morning fire," she demanded.

By the light streaming out of a nearby lodge she saw that Squaw Charley was looking at her defiantly. She set upon him, cursing and kicking, and drove him before her to the shelter.

"The pig!" she cried. "Running free since the sun was at the center of the sky and yet not a stick! May a thousand devils take the coward! He quakes like an aspen!"

Squaw Charley was indeed trembling, but only with the cold, and soon, under the shingle roof, the snuggling dogs would warm him. Blows and abuse counted nothing this night. He was fed, freedom was his, and he had paid a debt of gratitude.

CHAPTER VI.

"DAD, what's the day after tomorrow?"

Evan Lancaster pursed his mouth and thoughtfully contemplated his elder daughter.

"Ah c'd figger it out," he declared after a puzzled silence, "ef Ah had th' almanac." He hunted about, found the pamphlet and began to study the December page. "Trouble is," he said at last, "Ah don' know no day t' figger fr'm—Ah los' track 'way back yonder at th' fore part o' th' month. 'Sides, Ah kain't say whether this is Tuesday er Wednesday er Thursday. Mar'lyn, d' you remember w'at day o' th' week it is?"

Marylyn left the farther window and walked slowly forward. As she halted beside her sister the latter put an arm about her tenderly and drew her close. A change had recently come over the younger girl—a change that Dallas had not failed to see, yet had utterly failed to understand. Marylyn still performed her few tasks about the house, but with absentminded carelessness. Her work done, she took up the long neglected vigil at the windows, spending many quiet and seemingly purposeless hours there—all unmindful that the beaded belt lay dusty and unfinished on a shelf. Only by fits and starts was the shack enlivened by her happy chatter. At all other times she was wistful and distrait. Now, as she answered her father, a faltering light crept into her eyes.

"The last time Mr. Lounsbury was here," she said hesitatingly, "it was the 6th, and today is"—

"Ah c'n git it," the section boss interrupted. After a moment's tallying on his fingers he sat back and clapped his knees in excitement. "W'y, Dallas," he cried, "th' day after t'morrow 's the end o' thet man's six months!"

"Wood for the morning fire," she demanded.

Dallas released Marylyn. "Yes," she said, watching the younger girl wander back mechanically to the post she had forsaken. "And tomorrow you ought to start for Bismarck. Maybe it wouldn't matter if you waited awhile before going, but as long as the weather's good I think you ought to go right off."

"Ah reckon," he replied, but not heartily.

And so once more preparations for a trip were made. That night, when all was ready and Dallas and her father, having given the team a late feed, were leaving the stable together, she spoke to him of her sister.

"There's just one thing that worries me about your leaving," she said. "I don't know if you've noticed it or not, but Marylyn don't seem to be feeling good."

"Y' think mebbe she takes after her ma?" ventured the section boss.

Dallas nodded.

"No, no," he said, "she favors me, an' they's no need t' fret. They's nothin' th' matter with her—jus' off her oats a leetle, thet's all."

The developments of the next morning swept every thought from Dallas' mind save those concerning the journey. For when it came time to harness the mules she found that Ben had unaccountably gone lame. Whether his mate had kicked him or whether he had sprained a leg while exercising the previous afternoon she did not know. But it was plain that, so far as he went, the miles between quarter section and land office were impossible. At once Dallas suggested that Betty be driven single to a small pung that had been built for water hauling when the well froze up. Accordingly the mule was put before the sleigh. Failure resulted. Though both Dallas and her father alternately coaxed and scolded, Betty, with characteristic stubbornness, refused to budge a rod from the lean-to without Ben.

Dallas was in despair. "She won't go; she won't go," she said. "We've got to think of some other way."

"Yestiddy," observed the section boss as he unfastened the tugs, "y' said it wouldn' matter ef Ah didn' go now." He was somewhat complacent over the outcome of the hitch-up.

"I don't feel that way now," asserted Dallas.

"Thet ol' man up at th' leetle ben' has hosses," he volunteered when they were again within the shack.

"He took 'em to Clark's two months ago and walked back."

"Waal, how 'bout th' Norwegian over by th' mountain?"

"He keeps oxen. If a blizzard came up they'd never lead you out of it." Then she was moved to make a suggestion which she felt certain, however, would only be denounced. "There are hundreds of horses and mules at Brannon. I could ask there for a team."

Instantly Lancaster's ire was roused. "Thet's all Ah want t' hear fr'm you 'bout them blamed Yankees," he said hotly. "An Ah want y' t' remember it."

"But you're wrong, dad."

"Eh?" He turned upon her in amazed disgust.

"You're wrong," she repeated gently. "We oughtn't to treat the soldiers as is they was enemies. Some day we'll be in danger here"—

"Bosh!"

"And then we'll have to take their help."

He began to hobble up and down, working himself into a white heat. "'S long as Ah live on this claim," he said, "Ah'll never go t' Brannon fer anythin', an' they'll be no trottin' back an' forth. Thet ornery trash over thar is th' same, most of it, thet fought th' south jus' a few years ago. Ah kain't forget thet. An' not one of 'em 'll ever set a foot in this house."

After more hobbling he burst forth again. "Ah tell y', Dallas, Ah won't hev' you gals meetin' them no 'count soldiers"—

She smiled at him. "We don't want to meet any soldiers," she answered. "But there are women at the fort—women like mother. It seems a shame we can't know them."

"Y' mother raised y' t' be 's fine a lady as any of 'em over thar!"

"Maybe that's true. If it is, then they'd like us, wouldn't they, and we could have friends? I'm not thinking about myself—just about Marylyn."

"You gals got each other. Meetin' th' women at Brannon means meetin' th' men. An' Ah won't hev it!" His voice rose almost to a shout.

"I'll never speak to you about it again," she said. And her quiet acceptance mollified him.

"M' gal, y' kain't think how Ah feel about them Yanks," he went on tremulously. "An' Ah wan't y' t' promise me thet whether Ah 'm 'live er dead y' 'll allus keep on you' own side of th' river."

She glanced up at him quickly. "Do you mean that, daddy?" she asked, using the name he had borne in her babyhood.

"Ah do! Ah do!"

"Then I promise." Her tone was sorrowful.

"Mar'lyn?"

The younger girl faced about slowly.

"D' you promise?"

"Promise?" she repeated. "Yes—I—I promise."

Dallas knew that the trip to the land office was impossible unless Lounsbury should chance along—which was unlikely, some weeks having passed since his last visit. Undoubtedly were he to come he would help them. But would her father allow her to ask the storekeeper's aid? Probably not.

"I'll tell Charley about it tonight," she said finally. "We just got to find a way."

"What c'n he do?" retorted her father. "Far 's him 's gitting a team 's concerned, we might 's well look fer some one t' come right outen th' sky."

Her determination to ask advice of the pariah was a natural one. The morning that succeeded the night of the mules' terror she had awakened to find a reassuring explanation for their fear. In the growing light, as the trumpet sounded reveille from the fort, she sprang up and looked out expectantly. On the top of a drift in front of the door was a bundle of sticks! A hard crust had formed during the night, and moccasin tracks leading up to the wood and then pointing away again were cast in it with frozen clearness.

"That poor Indian!" she had exclaimed in grateful relief.

Not once after his summoning before Colonel Cummings had Squaw Charley forgotten daily to leave firewood at the shack. The evening of his second trip across the Missouri, Dallas had lain in wait for him, secreted under the dismantled schooner, which she had drawn into place beside the door. And as bringing his offering he crossed the snow softly and approached, the terrified mules again announced his coming, and she hailed him.

"Come on, come near," she had called. "I want to see you."

Eager to prove his good intent he had hastened forward, and she, just as eager to show her thankfulness, had led him into the house. There, with the distrustful eye of the section boss upon him and with Marylyn watching in trepidation from a distance, he had eaten and drunk at Dallas' bidding.

At the very moment when Dallas decided to confide in him Squaw Charley was not unmindful of her. Where the river bluffs back of Brannon shoved their dark shoulders through the snow, the wind having swept their tops clean of the last downfall, he was working away like a muskrat. To and fro he went, searching diligently for buffalo chips. A sack followed him on a rope tied to a leather belt, so that he could beat his hands against his breast as he covered every square rod of dead, curly grass on the uplands. The bag crammed to the top, he took off his blanket and, despite the cold, began to fill it also. For he knew, and fully as well as the [illegible] who watched the thermometer hanging just outside the entrance at headquarters, that the night would require much fuel.

As he hunted along the bare ridge something more than the frigid gusts that whipped the skirt about his lean shanks urged him to finish his gathering and go riverward. In the little snug cabin out on the prairie a cheery welcome awaited him. Before the glowing coals in the stone fireplace he could warm his shaking legs. There was good food for his empty stomach. But, better than all else, there a kindly face always smiled a greeting.

The blanket piled so high with chips that its weight balanced the grain sack, he prepared to start riverward. But first, prompted by an old habit, he climbed to a high point of bluff near by and standing where lookouts had maintained a post before severe weather compelled their withdrawal carefully scanned the white horizon. To the west, from where—the band in the stockade boasted—warriors of their tribe would come in the spring to make a rescue; to the north, on either side of the ice bound Missouri; to the east, in the wide gap between the distant ranges of hills, he saw no creature moving. But facing southward, his hands shading his eyes carefully from the glare, he spied on the eastern bank, and at not a great distance, the approach of a familiar milk white horse drawing a heavy pung.

Additional Locals

John Partridge is greatly improving the appearance and utility of his blacksmith shop by the addition of another storey to the front portion of the building.

Mr. Gouzee, of the advisory board of the Belgian Syndicates, arrived in Penticton on Saturday accompanied Mr. W. T. Shatford. The following day was spent in an examination of Penticton and its orchards. The Belgian Syndicates have their head office at Antwerp and have been investing largely in Canada having expended some $3,000,000 in the purchase of wheat lands in the Northwest. They have also purchased the O'Keefe and Greenhow ranches near Vernon and large tracts of land near Kelowna all of which they purpose irrigating and sub-dividing.

Mr. R. Salmon Backhouse, of London, Eng., and Mr. Alfred Symes, of Thorpe-le-Soken, Essex, Eng., capatalists and members of the London (Eng.) Stock Exchange, were the guests of Mr. W. T. Shatford at "The Ranche" on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. They are visiting Western Canada for the first time and have invested largely in Canadian securities. They state that British investors are now more favorably inclined towards Canadian investments than those of foreign countries and that there will be a large amount of British capital available for legitimate Canadian enterprise. Both gentlemen were very favorably impressed with the Okanagan and expect to return for a more detailed examination.

The Cannery.

The Southern Okanagan Canning Co., since the new cooker was installed, is turning out on an average about nine hundred cans daily, the largest output for one day being twelve hundred cans on Saturday, the 19th inst. The cost of production so far this season, according to information furnished by the Secretary, has been $1,612.20, while the canned goods produced are worth $1,934.40 at the wharf. This gives a net profit of twenty-three per cent. which is certainly very creditable.

According to those conversant with canning affairs, a cannery should be in a position to put up from five to ten thousand cans daily; and an effort will be made to interest sufficient capital to install a steam plant of such dimensions next season. This season the company has been seriously handicapped for lack of funds to cope satisfactorily with the situation. It is stated that enough fruit could be secured from Summerland alone to supply the cannery for a daily output of ten thousand cans. This will give an idea of the immense amount of business that may be secured with very little effort.

As to finding a market for the produce, there is no further room for doubt. The secretary of the company spent one or two days on the road looking up orders, when it was ascertained that the entire output for this season could be disposed of in Vernon alone, if desired. Although, at best, the entire output this year will not exceed three cars, there have been requests from Victoria for three cars, from the Vernon Fruit Co. for two cars and over if possible, from a Vancouver firm for a car of the best that could be put up to go to New Zealand as a sample of Okanagan produce. Besides these two cars have been sold at various local points in the Okanagan and Similkameen.

With the small plant now in use, this year's operations are much in the way of an experiment, but it must be admitted that the outlook is very hopeful, and with the interesting of additional capital, and the putting in of a steam plant, a thriving business should be done next year, under the very efficient supervision of the processor, W. Worsnop.
