Local and Personal

The Sunday School at St. Saviour's church will re-open next Sunday.

Howard DeBeck, jr., has gone to Toronto to pursue his studies in music.

Born—On Tuesday, Sept. 1, to Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Laidman, a daughter.

Miss R. Alcock has gone to Alberta to visit her brothers in that province.

F. Billings, barrister of Vernon, passed through from Hedley Wednesday evening.

Percy Scott, of Winnipeg, is visiting his cousin, Walter McCormack in Penticton.

A. Lang passed through from Peachland to his farm in Okanagan Falls on Thursday.

Born—On Wednesday, Sept. 2nd, to Mr. and Mrs. H. Huth, "The Pines," a daughter.

Miss Scott, of the B. C. Hotel, returned last week from a few weeks' visit at Vancouver.

The date of the Provincial Exhibition at New Westminster is Sept. 29 and 30 and Oct. 1, 2, 3.

J. H. McKenzie returned on Monday after several weeks' absence at his old home in Green Hill, N. S.

It is stated that the orchard of J. L. Pridham, of Kelowna, will this season produce 700 tons, or 35,000 boxes of apples.

Ernest Adams left a few days ago for the coast. He will take a position with the Fraser Valley Nursery Co. at Burnaby Lake.

C. L. Carless has transformed the appearance of his now handsome cottage by finishing it up outside and adding a coat of paint.

Mayor H. H. Gaetz, of Red Deer, Alta., arrived at Penticton on Thursday and will spend a few days here looking over his property.

H. L. DeBeck is enlarging the house on the property recently purchased from W. J. C. Ede. The addition will cost about six thousand dollars.

J. H. Munson, K. C., is at present laying plans for the erection of a large summer residence on Premier Heights, about two miles from town.

Chas. Lorenz, a brother-in-law of H. Murk, arrived from Germany on Friday evening of last week. He is a stonemason and will work at his trade here.

The Similkameen Star has nicknamed the rich valley through which the Great Northern is now constructing its line the "Jimhillkameen Valley."

R. Snowdy, of Moosejaw. Sas., has been spending the past week in Penticton. He is delighted with the place and intends sending his family here this fall and eventually making his home here.

Mrs. T. McAdam arrived from Vancouver on Tuesday to spend a month or two in Penticton. Mr. McAdam owns an orchard near town and it is probable they will come here to live next summer.

Operations at the local cannery have been somewhat retarded lately. This has been due to the slow ripening of the tomatoes and fruits as a result of the recent week's rainy weather. Some shipments of peaches are coming in from Summerland, and the farmers are beginning to bring in tomatoes in larger quantities. Five or six employees are now kept busy, and if the present fine weather continues the cannery will be running full force in a few days.

The infant son of Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Richardson died on Thursday, Aug, 27. The funeral took place at the English church cemetery on Friday, the Rev. R. W. Hibbert, in the absence of the rector, Rev. J. A. Cleland, conducting the service.

The total rainfall at Penticton for the year ending Aug. 31, 1908, was 12.89 inches, the fall for the various months being as follows: Aug. 1.13, Sept. .78, Oct. .30. Nov. .21, Dec. .64, Jan. 2.76, Feb. .28, Mar. .37, April .29, May 1.86, June .48, July .75, Aug. 3.04.

Senator Templeman, of Victoria, and party drove in from Keremeos on Monday, having come through the Crow's Nest and Southern Kootenay on their return from Ottawa. The Senator, who is an old printer and publisher, called at the PRESS office while here. The party left by steamer on the following morning.

The first sitting of the Penticton Small Debts Court, with magistrates Mitchell and Stevens, was held Thursday morning at 10 o'clock. The case was The S. C. Smith Lumber Co. vs. F. S. Bliss. Judgment was given against the defendant. The court will sit every Wednesday forenoon hereafter. A number of cases will probably be brought against the same person.

John Matheson, of Okanagan Falls, was in Penticton Tuesday and Wednesday, bringing in a load of fruit. He states that the fruit crop is exceedingly good this year at the Falls, but the distance from transportation makes marketing difficult. He expresses the hope that Okanagan River may soon be dredged so as to permit small boats to run between Penticton and that point.

Quite a party of Summerland sports came to Penticton on Monday evening to be on the ground next morning when shooting season for ducks opened. Many a slumberer was awakened at an early hour on the following morning by the report of shotguns, but as no bags of importance have been reported, the conjecture is that the mudhens and bitterns were the greatest sufferers.

Don't forget to take in the Fire Brigade Concert on Monday evening. It will be held, weather permitting, on the lakeshore near J. S. McDonald's boathouse at 7 o'clock. A scow will be moored near the shore and this will be used as a stage, while the audience will be accommodated with seats on the beach. Refreshments will be for sale and boats for hire. The ladies are arranging for several novel sideshows as well as an excellent programme. The proceeds will be devoted to the fire protection fund, not exclusively to the purchase of a fire bell.

The following letter, dated Fernie, Aug. 25th, has been received by the secretary of the citizens' committee in acknowledgement of the contributions from the citizens of Penticton to the Fernie sufferers. We may add that the sum of four dollars, realized by the sale of cakes left over from the supper given to the irrigation delegates, has since also been forwarded to Fernie: "Dear Sir,—Mr. Ross, M.P.P., has handed us the sum of $176.05, amount of subscription towards our relief fund from the citizens of Penticton, B. C., requesting us to acknowledge same to you. We can assure you that we thoroughly appreciate your action in this matter and would thank you to convey to the donors our hearty thanks. Yours respectfully, Fernie District Fire Relief Committee. Per H. C. Lockhart, secretary.

A C. P. R. engineer, who came in by boat Monday, left on the following morning for Carmi accompanied by Wm. Kruger as Guide. Mr. Kruger returned after going half the distance having met one of the surveyors of the company coming from Carmi. It appears that the object of the engineers, neither of whose names are known, was to locate the line run by the company some years ago.

H. Cleeve Ullmann, representing Westward Ho! the excellent monthly magazine published at Vancouver, is spending a few days in Penticton with a view to increasing the circulation of the journal in this locality as well as interesting local business men in its advertising columns. Westward Ho! is doing a good work in advertising British Columbia. Its June issue, of which a large number of copies were distributed at the Dominion Exhibition at Calgary, comprised a series of descriptive articles on different portions of the province, among them being a comprehensive and highly complimentary write-up of Penticton and district. The magazine contains the various classes of readable literature found in all high-class magazines, but bears the one distinctive feature—it is characteristically Canadian.

Among the Orchards.

A drive among the young orchards around Penticton is at the present time a decided treat, and we venture the remark that no orchards anywhere in the Okanagan look better, if as well. One day this week, in company with Mr. L. W. Shatford, we had the pleasure, for the first time this summer, of inspecting the entire bench east and north-east of town. The numerous lots that were planted during the past spring make a fine showing, the apple and peach trees having made a growth of from two to four feet. However, the orchards that are now experiencing their third summer are the ones that most take the eye of the observer. One who had not been familiar with the history of the district could hardly believe that the large trees, perfect in shape and uniform in growth, could be brought to their present stage of development in three summers. The secret is clean culture, sufficient water, careful pruning and spraying, added to an exceptionally nutritious soil. To the S. O. Land Co. belongs the credit for the excellent condition of most of the orchards belonging to absentees, but many of those belonging to actual residents look quite as well.

Among the older orchards deserving of special mention are those belonging to the Premier, Hon. Richard McBride, Chas. Green, ex-Minister of Lands and Works, several lots belonging to J. H. Munson, K. C., of Winnipeg, those of A. R. Wade and C. W. Risteen, also of Winnipeg, and A. H. Glass and P. H. Eraut, of Penticton. Those, however, are the three year old plantations, while numerous others of one and two years standing look quite as well for the time they have been in existence.

Many of the young peach trees would have borne a considerable crop this season, but it was thought best to prune them closely, thus preventing bearing, developing a sturdy trunk and conserving the forces for next season. While any estimate of the peach crop at Penticton for next year could merely be approximate, basing our calculations upon the production of four year old orchards at other points in the valley, and the acreage that will come into bearing, a very conservative estimate would place the number of crates that will be produced at 35,000. In addition to the revenue that will thus come to the community another great benefit will be that when the orchards begin to produce, most of the owners, who have not yet settled here, will come to reside permanently and thus add to the material prosperity of the community by their presence.

WARNING!

NOTICE is hereby given that it is illegal to shoot, hunt, or have in possession willow grouse in the counties of Yale, Cariboo and Kootenay between the 31st day of August, 1908, and the 30th day of September, 1908, inclusive. Grouse of all kinds in the counties of Vancouver and Westminster between the 31st day of August, 1908, and the 30th day of September, 1908, inclusive. A close season has also been declared for prairie chicken throughout the province of British Columbia until the 31st day of August, 1909, inclusive.

C. P. R. Strike.

At present it looks as though the entire Cadadian Pacific Railway system were to be tied up, for should the engineers, firemen, conductors and trainmen join the machinists in their strike not a wheel can be moved. The question has not been regarded in nearly as serious a light as the circumstances merited, for the tying up of the system at this season of the year must spell disaster to the entire west.

The last year has been particularly trying to the western provinces of Canada, and it had been hoped that the present good crop with fair prices would loosen up finances and set the wheels of progress once more in operation. It requires no imagination to depict the results that will accrue from the inability to convey that crop to the markets of the world.

It is useless to attempt to attach the blame for the strike to one party or the other of those concerned. Both regard the question from their own standpoint and cannot be expected to do so from that of the other. It is the system that is to blame, and such circumstances will occur just so long as such large capitalistic institutions exist, and laboring men are permitted to combine against them. Great things were expected of the Lemieux Act as a factor in the settlement of disputes, but it has proved what it must have appeared in the mind of any reasoning man, nothing less than a farce. Compulsory arbitration, on the other hand, might prove more effective, but the system can scarcely be considered as just. All such efforts, which do not attempt to get at the bottom of the question, must in the end prove futile.

The railways, and all other institutions upon which the people are dependent to so great a degree, should be the property of the state, and be operated for the benefit of the people as a whole and not of either a corporation or a labor organization. It is a shame to permit a system to exist by which two factions of citizens may be the cause of the practical closing down of the business of an entire nation.

The people of Canada are awaking slowly to the belief that the state must own the trusts, and, chief among them, the means of transportation. Under such a system every employee would get fair treatment and a fair wage, and labor unions and labor agitators would pass out of existence.

Dredge the River.

At the recent session of the Canadian House of Commons the sum of $5,000 was placed in the estimates for the dredging of Okanagan River between Okanagan and Dog Lakes, the object being to render the river navigable to small steamers between points on Okanagan Lake and the settlement at Okanagan Falls.

Up to the present moment we have waited with patience for the work to begin, or for some announcement relative thereto, but as nothing has yet been done and no announcement has been forthcoming, it begins to look as though the work would be deferred until after the impending federal elections, and that the grant will be used merely as an election bait to induce the electors of the Okanagan to support the government candidate. The voters of this district will not be caught with chaff and will require to see the work well under way before it will have any influence upon their voting tendencies. The best guarantee that the government can give of its good faith is to get at the work at once and have it sufficiently under way before election day to ensure its completion at an early date. Otherwise in all probability it will not be done during the life of the next parliament.

The dredging of the river may be regarded, not merely as a requirement, but as an absolute necessity to the people of the Falls, where a large and most excellent fruit growing section has been retarded in its development for years through lack of communication. The work would also benefit Penticton to a very great degree, giving an open means of communication between the two places. We would urge that the local Liberal Association impress upon the government the necessity of beginning the work at once.

Time to Incorporate.

The season is getting well advanced, and we believe it now time that active steps were taken relative to incorporation. There are obvious reasons why the work should be completed so that the council could take control from the beginning of the new year. It will require about all the time between now and the first of January, 1909, to complete the organization.

It is unnecessary to again reiterate the arguments in favor of municipal organization. There was a time at no very great distance back when there was considerable opposition to the proposition, but this has entirely melted away, and we doubt now that an individual in town or district could be found who would oppose the proposition. We would, therefore, merely urge that the initiatory work be begun at once. It will probably be necessary to call a public meeting and appoint a committee to take charge.

The Plow Woman

By ELEANOR GATES,

Author of "The Biography of a Prairie Girl."

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY McCLURE, PHILLIPS & COMPANY.

ward. Across each lay a crimson stripe—the mark of the plow handle.

For the second time she read his meaning. "Yes, I like the prairie," she answered, "if I do have to plow." And she stepped from the furrow to the unturned sod.

As she stood there Lounsbury caught the clear outline of her firmly drawn face. Beside her Marylyn, slight and colorless, was for the moment eclipsed. The hat of the elder girl was brushed back, displaying a forehead upon which shone the very spirit of the unshackled. Her hands, large, yet not too large for the splendid figure of which they were the instruments, were clasped upon her breast. Watching her, it seemed to Lounsbury that she must have sprung as she was from the plains one day—grave, full grown and gallant.

Her father's voice broke in harshly. "Ah didn' want she should plow," he protested. "Ah figgered t' git some one on tick, but seems like Dallas she"—

"We like it here," she interrupted, "because the air is cool and there's lots of grass." Then, after bending to gather a purple flower, she stepped back to the plow.

"You're planning to stay, then," said Lounsbury.

"Stay!" burst forth the section boss. "Don' it look like it?"

Lounsbury made no reply, only smiled genially.

"Maybe y' reckon we-all ain't safe?" continued Lancaster. "Waal, th' nesters roun' Fort Sully's safe 'nough."

The storekeeper pointed across the river to where a flag was flying at the center of the post quadrangle. "You're in sight of that," he said simply.

The other snorted. Then, stifling a retort, he searched Lounsbury's face with his milky blue eyes. "Ah'd like t' ast w'y y' didn' tell me 'bout th' track when Ah seen y' las'," he observed suspiciously.

The storekeeper gave a hearty laugh. "And why didn't you say you had daughters?" he demanded.

Instantly a change came over the elder man. He darkened angrily. His breath shortened as if he had been running. Visible trembling seized him, body and limbs.

Mystified, Lounsbury turned to Dallas and saw that her eyes were fastened upon her father imploringly. "No, no, dad," he heard her whisper; "no, no."

The storekeeper hastened to speak. "Joking aside," he said, "the reason is this: The railroad company wants the right kind of people to settle on the land along the survey. It doesn't want men who'd file just to get a price, so the story hasn't leaked much."

Lancaster was fumbling at his crutches. "Ah see; Ah see," he said sullkily. Then, with an attempt at being courteous: "Come up t' th' shack, Lounsb'ry. Y' brung good news. Y' got t' hev you' dinner."

"I ate back there," said Lounsbury, dismounting, "but I'll stop off for awhile just the same." As he slipped the reins over his horse's head Marylyn remembered the meal she had abandoned and started homeward. The storekeeper, leading his mount, strode away beside her.

Dallas clucked to the mules.

"Ain't you comin'?" called her father. "W'y, my gal, you worked 'nough this mornin'."

"I'll keep at it just a little longer," she answered.

"We don' hear ev'ry day thet we live on a town site with a railroad a-comin'," Lancaster said, following her a few steps. "Better come."

Dallas did not reply. When she was some rods farther on her father called to her again.

"Come, Dallas," he urged, "an' stop plowin' up th' streets."

She shook her head, slapped the reins along Ben and Betty's dusty backs and leaned guidingly on the handles of the plow. And as she traveled slowly riverward Simon trotted close behind, tossing his stubby horns at the red of her underskirt and bawling wearily.

CHAPTER II.

BEFORE Dallas reached the end of her furrow she knew that for at least some days to come her work on the plowed strip must cease. Far and wide frontiersmen may have heard of the railroad's coming, and their first move would be, perhaps had been, a rush to the land office to file upon quarter sections touching the survey. And so no hour dared be wasted before her father started on his long deferred trip. The claim on the peninsula—the claim which the storekeeper had named as the terminus of the proposed line, as the probable site for a new town—must at once be legally theirs.

When the mules were turned eastward again Dallas brought them up for a breathing spell and, going apart a little distance, sat down, her knees between her hands. A short space of time had made incredible changes in their plans, in the possibilities of their prairie home. Before the cutting of the last two sods there had stretched ahead only a succession of uneventful years whose milestones would be the growing record of beeves and bushels, but now—she could not have credited her senses had it not been for a glimpse of Lounsbury's horse industriously cropping beside the lean-to.

She looked across at the shack, squatting on a gentle rise at the center of the claim as if it had fled there for refuge out of the grassy sea whose dry waves lapped up to its very door. Its two small windows looking riverward, the narrow door of warped lumber between and the shock roof of meadow grass held down by stones gave it the appearance of a grotesque human head that was peering from out the plain. As Dallas for the first time noted the curious resemblance the shack seemed to smile back at her—a wise, reassuring smile.

A moment later the north wind hooded the sky with clouds, putting the bend in gloom. She got to her feet and hastened toward the plow. So brief had been her meeting with the storekeeper that immediately following it his features had escaped her. Now she recalled them and thought that she recalled that when he had accosted her they had worn a mocking expression. What if her father in his sudden excitement and concern should tell Lounsbury that the claim was not yet filed upon; should confide in this stranger, who might then take advantage of the ignorance, age and crippled condition of the section boss! Hurriedly she unhitched Ben and Betty, hung their bridles on the hames and turned the team loose to graze. Then she started homeward with Simon close upon her heels, and as she crossed the cloud darkened claim she glanced again at the shack. Its windows were in shadow, its door almost obscured. There was a smirk on its twisted face.

But when, entering the house, she met Lounsbury's kind, level look the distrust she had felt unconsciously vanished.

He was seated astride a bench to the left of the fireplace, his hat flung down in front of him, his shoulders against the wall, his booted legs thrust out restfully across the floor. Dallas, seeing him out of the saddle for the first time, was struck by his splendid length, next by his heaviness—a round but muscular heaviness that she had never noted in a Texan. Leaning back with folded arms, he showed, however, despite his weight and rotundity, the pliance and the litheness of the westerner. His hair was dark and thick and worn in a careless part, his throat was bronzed above the lacings of his shirt, his face clean shaven, somewhat square, yet full, and set with blue eyes that showed an abiding glint of merriment.

If Dallas as she crossed the sill formed with the swift keenness of the plainswoman a new and truer estimate of Lounsbury, he, saluting cordially, failed not to measure her. The dirt floored shack, partitioned by Navajo blankets and furnished with unplaned benches, was a background totally unsuited to Marylyn's delicate beauty, but for the elder daughter of the section boss its very rude simplicity seemed strangely fine and fitting.

Many women had come under the storekeeper's notice during his frontier life—roughly reared women of pure ways who toiled and bore with the patience of beasts, the women of the army, matching in dress and habits those he had known as a boy, and last of all the kind that always follows in the track of soldier, scout and gambler. Yet never before on the sundown side of the Mississippi had he seen one who possessed along with the reserve a lonely bringing up enjoins the dignity and poise that are counted the fruits of civilization.

"It's good blood," he said to himself, "and"—with a glance at the section boss—"it's from the mother's side."

Lancaster at that moment was truly anything but a picture of repose. His season of delight over the morning's news had been brief and was now succeeded by thorough disquiet. He hobbled to and fro from the hearth, where hung a pail of fragrant coffee, to the farther front window. Lounsbury remarked his evident worry and, not understanding it, bent down inquiringly toward Marylyn.

She was seated on a buffalo robe before the fire zealously tending the coffee. As she felt the storekeeper's look upon her she glanced up, and, meeting his eyes, something other than the firelight swept her throat, neck and brow with crimson touch.

"There's no fretting in that quarter," was Lounsbury's mental comment. He turned on the bench to face Dallas.

She was standing quietly beside the warped door, her arms hanging tensely at her side, her chin up, her eyes gazing straight at him, and in 'them as well as in her whole attitude Lounsbury read determination and anxiety.

"What's the matter, I wonder," he thought. He leaned toward her, resting an elbow on the bench. "You're getting ready for spring seeding, Miss Lancaster," he said.

"Yes."

The section boss giggled nervously. "Ef th' town was right here it wouldn' make no difference t' Dallas. Ah'll bet she'll spen' th' winter shellin' cawn fer plantin' an' pickin' cockle outen th' wheat." He fell to tugging at his goatee.

Again there was silence. Then, with a deep breath, Dallas straightened to speak. It was borne to her of a sudden that they were in need of one in whom they might confide, of one from whom good advice might come. She felt impelled to tell this stalwart young man, whose eyes read kindness and whose face read right, who seemed to bear them nothing but good will, that they had not filed the claim, and then—

The fire crackled cozily, the blackened pail steamed from the crosspiece. Lounsbury spread out his hands before the blaze. "I wish I lived on a quarter, like you folks," he said. "I hate the dickering in a store. Been at it ten years. Was in the fur business at first—bought from the Indians and the skin hunters up and down. Well, the country got into my blood. You get the west, you know, and it's the only disease out here that you can't shake. So I've stayed, and I guess I'll keep a-staying. But sometimes I get a notion to throw my stores up and go into the cow business or farming."

Dallas sank back, checked not by Lounsbury's words, but by her father. The section boss, one hand behind a hairy ear, was glowering at the storekeeper. "Eh, what?" he asked suspiciously.

"I say I've a notion to take up some land," repeated Lounsbury. "Right east of you wouldn't be a bad idea. The sod's wonderful hereabouts—no stumps, no stones, and the loam's thick. Look in the coulee—you can see there how far it is to the clay. That's why she wore down so deep"—

"Thet arroyo?"

"Yes. I believe I'll just pick out a quarter near it. Could plant a store anyway when the track comes."

"Yas, certainly," said Lancaster. He passed Dallas, giving her a helpless, apprehensive stare. "But, shucks, Ah wouldn' be in such a tarnel hurry ef Ah was you. Spring's plenty o' time."

Lounsbury swung round sharply. "Spring!" he exclaimed in amazement. "I hope that hasn't been your plan, sir. A man can't file too soon."

Dallas leaned toward Lounsbury again, and her lips parted. But a quick, peremptory gesture from her father interrupted. "Mar'lyn," he cried, his eyes warning the elder girl, "look out fer thet coffee. It's a-bilin' over."

And Dallas saw that her father did not trust the storekeeper—perhaps feared him—and that he did not wish his own neglect to be known.

But a hint of the state of affairs at the shack had already entered Lounsbury's mind. As Marylyn rose to pour the coffee he quickly changed the subject. "Fort 's a quiet place these days," he observed, accepting a cup. "Wonder when the troops 'll be back."

"A man can't file too soon."

The section boss sipped at his saucer. "Ah don' carry on no dealin's with Yankee soldier trash," he answered curtly. "They keep they side o' th' river, an' we-all keep ourn."

Lounsbury laughed. "Well," he said, "you'll find when the redskins get nasty that the army blue looks pretty good."

The other shrugged.

The storekeeper tapped the holster hanging upon a thigh. "I carry a popgun regular." He set down the cup, pulled at his boot legs and arose.

"Ah reckon Ah c'n hol' my own, sah." Lancaster's pride was touched.

"No doubt of it," assured the younger man, preparing to go. "I hope," he continued, "that you'll call on me at any time—if you need more provisions, say."

Lancaster did not misunderstand the offer of credit. "Thank y'," he replied stiffly, "but we certainly got 'nough t' las' through."

Lounsbury remembered how small, compared with the orders of other wintering settlers, was the Lancaster stock, and thought, too, how likely it was that every passerby would be fed with true southern hospitality, thus diminishing the supply. But he refrained from making any further suggestion. He bade the family goodby, lingering a little at parting beside the younger girl.

"Miss Marylyn," he said, "before another winter you'll be the belle of the town of Lancaster."

She put her hand in his bashfully.

"And Miss Dallas?" His voice entreated a little.

"I hope you'll be the biggest storekeeper," she said.

To Lounsbury's surprise, he saw a trace of fun lurking in her eye. "Ah, you've forgiven me!" he declared triumphantly.

But she made no answer as she turned away.

The next moment he was galloping toward the coulee crossing.

Marylyn watched him go. When, having disappeared into the ravine, he came into sight again on the farther side he turned in his saddle and saw her. He took off his hat and waved it. She answered with a farewell signal and stood, looking after him, until distance dwarfed horse and rider to a dot.

On the storekeeper's departure the shack became a scene of action. Lancaster gave over walking the floor and collected bedding for a journey. Marylyn was called in to prepare a box of food for her father—potatoes from the coals of the fireplace, cured pig meat from the souse barrel, bread and a jug of coffee—while Dallas caught the mules, gave them some grain and a rubbing down with straw wisps and greased the wagon wheels. All being made ready, the section boss took leave of his daughters, urging them to keep within the next day when the surveyors came up and to deny his going. Then with Ben and Betty at a smart trot he set off for Bismarck and the land office.

When he was gone the squat shack on the bend became vigilant. Ceaselessly its eyes covered the stretch of road between ferry landing and coulee—ceaselessly, though Dallas alone kept watch for wayfarers. Not until night fell and the cloud masked moon disappeared behind the western bluffs were small blankets pinned into place across the windows and the peering shock head made sightless.

But even with the house darkened, the early supper eaten and Marylyn asleep in her bed before the hearth the elder girl still kept on the alert. A nervousness born of loneliness had taken possession of her. If the door latch rattled, she raised herself, listening. If Simon rubbed himself against the warm outer stones of the fireplace, she sprang up, a startled sentinel, with wide eyes and clinched hands.

But an hour passed. The wind lulled. Simon lay down. She fell to thinking of the storekeeper. She felt surer than ever now that he did not covet the bend. Setting aside the fact that he had brought them good news, she was glad he had come. It gave them a neighbor. And, yes, she forgave him the smile that had provoked her resentment. After all, the name Dallas did sound Texas.

With morning and the rising of the sun she was up and doing the few chores about lean-to and shack. But when the surveyors arrived, making short work of their last few miles, she and Marylyn shut themselves in and escaped being seen. The engineers gone toward Clark's, Dallas again took up her watch.

Twice before night she was rewarded. The mail sergeant passed, bringing a batch of letters to a grateful post, and late in the afternoon an Indian runner came into sight from up the Missouri. Scorning to use the ferry, he dropped into the river where the coulee emptied and swam across.

The arrival of the scout Dallas associated instinctively with the expected return of the troopers and felt a relief that she would not have cared to confess to her father. The unusual bustle that marked the next three days at Brannon seemed to justify her belief. Below the barracks on the level bottom land men were busy erecting a strange structure. Tall cottonwoods were hauled from the river and set on end in the sandy ground. As time passed these came to form a tight, circular pen.

The night of the third day there was activity on the other bank of the Missouri. Unknown to shack and fort, the squalid line of shanty saloons that stretched itself like a waiting serpent along a high bench opposite the new stockade sprang into sudden life. Two wagons filled with men and barrels crossed the bend and emptied themselves into the dilapidated buildings. And far into the early hours loud laughter, the click of chips and the clink of glasses disturbed the quiet of the night. At dawn an officer standing, field glass in hand, on the gallery at headquarters saw two wagons drawn up in front of Shanty Town and called down a curse upon the heads of the sleeping revelers.

"Just see there!" he exclaimed. "Some vermin got wind of the paymaster's coming and are here to fleece the men."

A lieutenant sauntered up, putting out his hand for the glasses. "There wasn't a soul in those huts yesterday," he said.

"No, of course not," sputtered the other. "The devils stayed at Clark's till the punchers got back from Kansas City. Now they're on hand to keep our guardhouse and hospital full. By gad, if I commanded here I'd have the whole street fired!"

"Well," said the lieutenant, "the men have a way of disciplining that kind themselves. Some day when a favorite is cut in a brawl or cheated at cards they'll shoot up the place. If there's anything left it 'll move on."

"It won't do any harm to keep an eye on Shanty Town, all the same," declared his companion fiercely. "Remember the man that ran it last year?

COMMUNICATIONS

(We do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions of correspondents.)

An Appeal to Local Optionists.

To the Editor of THE PENTICTON PRESS:

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I beg to appeal to all friends of temperance organizations, societies and churches throughout British Columbia to make some united effort for the purpose of local option campaign work soon to begin in our province. The legislature only needs to hear the will of the people expressed by the ballot in order to grant their request.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union, Sons of Temperance, the Independent Order of Good Templars and other similar societies as well as the churches, should fall into line and make one movement both for economic and effective results. I urge the heads of all these organizations to correspond, get together, discuss and organize. It is one issue—local option, and calls for one thing more, viz: work. There is no secrecy, there is no denominational advantage, there is no party interest, but the common good of all the people. The business of a local option law is the business in hand,

I should be glad to hear from all over the province what is proposed and who is ready for the battle against the ravages wrought by the liquor traffic. We might then form some workable committee and divide the province into districts. Cities, towns and villages must all be united. It is to be hoped that no society or denomination will run a little show of its own, but unite in one supreme effort for the common weal. (Rev.) D. SPENCER.
