ABBOTSFORD vs LANGLEY

The above teams met in the final match for the Hill-Tout cup on Saturday at the school grounds Abbotsford before a goodly crowd of spectators. Both teams were weakened by the absence of regular players; Langley wanting their full back C. Kirby while Abbotsford took the field minus Wells, Metcalfe and Brown.

Abbotsfor dlined up as follows; Featherstonehaugh, (V. Harrop; Jackson, Adams; Gough; Hogg; T. McPhee; Heath; Ferguson; McGowan; Gernaey. T, L. Hutton was referee.

Abbotsford won the toss and started playing down hill. The game had not been long in progress when Gernaey pluckily took advantage of a mistake by one of the Langley backs and netted the ball. Abbotsford never looked back after this and after some close play in midfield McGowan converted a nice cross by Tupper McPhee and later on the same player scored with an overnead kick which the Langley goalkeeper swung into his goal. This ended the first half with the score 3-0 for Abbotsford.

On resuming Abbotsford boys seemed to easeup a bit and Langley came pretty near scoring on several occasions, only clever saving by Dick Featherstonehaugh preventing them. Abbotsford weakened up again and Tupper McPhee was fouled close in and from the resulting kick the visitors left half handled and a penalty was granted. McGowan took the kick and easily beat the goalkeeper. The game was finished in rather bad light owing to the late arival of the car from Langley. Abbotsford won out by the comfortable margin of four goals and look like sticking to the cup for another season. President Hill-Tout seemed very happy after the match and complimented "his boys" on their win.

For Abbotsford Featherstonehaugh did splendidly in goal, both backs Harrop and Jackson played their usual steady game. The half back line was greatly improved from last week Gough playing well in his new position, while Hogg played a good clean game right through. Tupper McPhee showed what the juniors can do and put across some dandy centres while Gernaey on the left played with rare dash. McGowan and Feguson opened out the play in good style while Heath played wel lfor his first game this season.

Swan, Paxton and Pickles were the best for the visitors, although Swan played below form and seemed to miss Kirby.

THE MARKET.

Larger than it has been for some time was the crowd that attended the market on Friday morning last but the retail offerings were not comparable to the size of the buying assembly. Vegetables were numerous at wholesale, though the buyers were not very plentiful which might be accounnted for by the fact that the prices were not any too low in comparison with the large amount of produce offered for sale. On the retail market the vegetables were not very numerous, but the offerings were of excellent quality. For the first time this season Savoy cabbage made its appearance on the market, the sales of the same not being very large as few people hereabouts were familiar with the variety. Celery showed a slight change some small bunches being sold at five cents each and the larger ones for ten cents each, or three for a quarter.

Eggs were very scarce and retailed at 60 cents a dozen, and were almost unattainable at the wholesale price. Butter remained firm at forty cents per pound.

Meat at wholesale was chiefly noticeable by the large quanitity of pork on hand and the scarcity of beef. Veal and mutton offerings were fair, the price of all wholesale meats being unchanged. There was no change recorded in the price of retail meats.

Apples and pears were the only fruit on the market and the quality ruled the price.

Smelts again made their appearance on the fish market and sold readily at ten cents per pound. Sea trout were again offered at twenty cents per pound, each fish weighing over three pounds.

The poultry market was a large one and the offerings were of a character somewhat higher than usual. The offerings of large pullets andy oung hens was particularly good and there was not so much scratch up stock offered for sale.

There was the usual large supply of American poultry, which, however took a second place to the Fraser Valley product;

The price asked for hens in small lots stoo dpretty steady at one dollar each, although some were sold for less. Some fancy broilers were sold as high as $13 per dozen Ducks also ran to extremes, and were sold all the way from ten to thirteen dollars.

Neither geese nor turkeys were offererd for sale, but the price remained the same as that of last week.

Lessons on Singing

BY CHAS. F. WARD

This paper has arranged with Mr. Chas. F. Ward, Director of the Columbia Conservatory of Music, Vancouver, to publish a weekly lesson on voice production the first of which appears below Mr. Ward takes up the art of production from the beginning and his lessons will doubtless be interesting and profitable to the advanced singer as well as the beginner.—Ed.

LESSON No. I.

A singer may understand all the technicalities of music and yet know little or nothing of the vocal organism.

There is no excuse for throatiness, hoarseness, weariness, nasality, swollen tonsils, elongated uvula, unruly tongue, excessive saliva, dryness of the throat and the thousand and one ills to which a singer's flesh is heir. Breathing is not the training of the voice, but it is the one thing that supplies the necessary life and energy to the nerve centres of theb ody.

Abdominal Breathing

Abdominal or scientific breath-is a revelation to sufferers from nervous ailments, as chronic complaints of long standing yield to it. The mode of applying it is something that every man woman and child should be taught to practice daily.

Exercise as follows; Inhale thro the nose a full deep breath, thrusting out and completely filling the abdomen. This should occupy five seconds. Now, by contracting the abdomen, force the air into the upper chest and hold it there twenty seconds, throwing the shoulders well back; lastly exhale slowly This should occupy not less than five seconds. Repeat this exercise daily for ten minutes, night and morning.

2. Inhale as before, a full breath through the nose, coomencing with the abdomen and by similar contraction transfer the breath to the upper chest. Hold it five seconds. Standing now with the chest inflated and abdomen drawn in, you must by simple effort which practice renders easy, again make the transfer, forcing the breath back to the abdomen.

Continue the pumping process half a dozen times on the same breath before expulsion, and repeat for ten minutes each morning immediately on awakening. Practice it lying down in a well ventilated room and then in a standing position. Use discretion and never tire yourself. The effect of this exercise is precisely what we are looking for in the breaking up of any feeling of fear, doubt, anxiety, craving or appetite. viz; a strengthening stimulant to the nerve centres, which has the effect of introducing a new train of sub-conscious sensation, which is evidence of the sub-consciousness to think.

The Man In the Box

A Detective Solved the Mystery of His Being There

By John L. Everhart

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

When I first entered upon the detective business, being inexperienced, I found it difficult to get a position, and when I got one I couldn't keep it. I had been tried by one or two agencies, but had been outwitted by the parties I had been sent to outwit, and after one of my failures found myself with no employment and not a cent in my pocket.

I was walking disconsolately along an avenue occupied solely by dwellings when I saw a negro man ahead of me wheeling a box on a truck. He seemed to be talking to himself in a low tone, and I came up behind him without making any noise. Indeed, my footfalls couldn't very well be heard because the day was wet and I wore rubbers. Walking for a short distance behind him, I heard him say, "When I get to the steps going down into the basement I'll call 'Look out!' so's you can brace yourself."

As soon as I heard this I surmised that somebody was in the box. There seemed to me but one reason for any one to be thus incased, and that was either to break or evade the law. Some person was going to effect an entrance somewhere in order to be concealed in the box till a favorable opportunity should arise to commit a crime or some one was escaping from the police. My detective instincts further told me that if the person in the box were going to rob he would be taken to a mercantile building. If he were going to escape the police he would be taken to a railroad station and shipped as freight.

This last was my favorite theory. I knew that it was much easier to appropriate movable property belonging to others than to get away with it and turn it into cash.

Suddenly the negro porter turned, wheeling the box into the basement door of a handsome dwelling house. I had purposely dropped behind him that in case he stopped I would not feel obliged to walk past him. He eased the truck down three steps under the stoop, and just as he reached the basement door it was opened by a maid.

"Aha!" I said to myself. "This is a servant's scheme. There are more burglaries committed through the connivance of servants than any other way. There is a man in that box, who when every one in the house is asleep will get out of it and carry off what valuables he can find. We shall see whether he will or not."

It was just before dark that the box was wheeled into the house. The hour fitted my theory exactly. A person would not wish to remain shut up in such uncomfortable quarters any longer than necessary. Even as it was it would be necessary for him to stay where he was for several hours. I waited till I saw the negro go away with his truck, then cast about for an excuse to visit the house with a view to locating the position of the box. An advertisement distributer had left some handbills puffing a face powder on the stoops along the street. Gathering a few of them, I went to the basement door of the house I was interested in and rang the bell. The maid who had let in the porter answered the summons, first lighting a gas jet in the basement.

As soon as she opened the door I saw the box standing in a corner in the hall where the darky had left it. The top was still on it. The maid was a very nice looking girl, not one to be suspected of admitting a burglar to the house. I asked her if I could sell her some face powder, but at the same time she saw me looking at the box and shut the door in my face.

But since I had seen what I wished to see this treatment didn't trouble me. I had very little doubt that I had discovered an incipient robbery. I was not doubtful as to the means of preventing it. What interested me was how to turn that prevention to my own account. If I went to the owner of the premises and told him that there was a burglar concealed in his basement he would call the police, the burglar would be arrested and very likely the owner would give me $5 for having furnished him the information. I was after a larger reward.

It seemed to me that I would better find out something concerning the people who lived in the house. It was a handsome stone front dwelling and could only be inhabited by wealthy people. Fortunately I remembered that the census for 1910 was being taken. I would avail myself of this fact. As a census official I could ask all the questions I liked without suspicion. But I would likely be admitted by the maid to whom I had tried to sell the face powder, and it wouldn't do to play two parts to the same audience. I went to my room, where I kept various makeup materials and put on a different suit of clothes and a full beard and mustache and spectacles. Thus arrayed, I went to the house in question, rang the front door bell and was admitted by the same maid as before. I told her that I must see the master of the house about the census, and she showed me into the front parlor and went upstairs.

In a few minutes an elderly gentleman came down. There was something about him I didn't like at all. He had the craftiest face and eye on him of any man I ever saw. I had a blank book in my hand and, opening it preparatory to taking down replies, asked him such questions as are usually asked by census gatherers. I learned that his name was Laurence Girard, that he lived in the house with his niece, who would come of age in a few days, and that he and she were the only persons living there except the servants, whose names I took down with pretended care.

Having asked all the questions I dared, I shut up my book and departed. One thing I had decided on—that I wouldn't trust that man to reimburse me for any information I might give him without security. As I was descending the steps a man turned to enter at the basement door.

"Do you live here?" I asked.

"Yes, sir; I'm the butler."

"I'm taking the census. Let me see if I have your name."

I looked in the record I had taken and found the man's name—Richard Coyne. Then I engaged him in conversation. I found him uncommunicative. I asked him what kind of a man his master was and received an evasive reply. But when I mentioned his master's niece he warmed up a bit.

"Miss Edith is a lovely girl," he said.

"It must be lonely for her here living with an old man," I remarked.

The man made no reply to this, but there was evidence of something passing in his mind.

When I left him I had made up my mind that there was a mystery connected with the premises. I shifted my theory from a hiding burglar, though I couldn't form any other. I was seized with an uncontrollable desire to pass the night in the house and see what happened—that is, if anything did happen. But I despaired of framing any plan that would enable me to do so. Then I considered the expediency of breaking in. As soon as I was convinced that every one in the house except the person in the box was asleep I went into the alley at the rear and found that by climbing over a high fence I could get into the back yard of the house in question.

Going to my room, I took a burglar's jimmy, some skeleton keys and an electric hand lamp, and about 11 o'clock went back to the house, concealing myself in the back yard. Half an hour after I saw the last light turned out. I examined a rear basement window—not in the hall where the box was—and, finding that I could take out a pane of glass and unlock the window, I did so. After passing inside and listening I sprung my electric light and found myself in the kitchen. Going through a door into the hall, I located the box from memory. But I didn't go near it. I sat down in the kitchen and waited.

An hour passed without a sound. Then I heard a screw turning. After several such raspings I heard a board—probably from the top of the box—laid gently on the floor. There were more screw turnings; then after another board was removed I heard sounds indicating that some one was getting out of the box. In a few minutes more footsteps indicated a person coming stealthily toward the kitchen door. Drawing a revolver I always carried, I pressed the key of my electric light and it fell full on a man's face.

He was nothing like a burglar, but a well dressed young man about twenty-one. He was very much startled.

"Come in here," I said, and, taking him into the kitchen, I shut the door.

"Tell me what this means."

"First tell me who you are," he replied.

I told him of my accidental discovery of his entrance into the house. Then he unfolded a diabolical plot of the master of the house to make away with his niece, who, at eighteen, would be in possession of an immense fortune. The young man was her lover. He was ignorant of what plan her uncle would adopt to remove her and get her property, to which he was next in line of inheritance, but the servants had told him that the young lady was kept a prisoner. The maid and the butler were in the lovers' secret, which was to release the girl.

Of course I sympathized with his object and offered to help him. He had been informed as to the room the girl was confined in. She knew of his projected attempt and was waiting for him. I followed him upstairs stealthily to the room he sought, and when we reached it he put his hand on the knob to open it. He failed to do so.

Turning to me with despair on his face, he whispered:

"It's locked."

"Let me try," I said, and, getting out my skeleton keys, I opened the door.

Giving place to him, my eyes were good enough to see that he was joined by a woman. Without a word all three of us passed down the staircase, but found every door locked and the keys removed. I led the lovers to the window by which I had entered, and, passing out, we two men helped the girl over the fence. From the alley we entered a thoroughfare which at that hour was deserted. I was about to leave them when the young man said:

"Come with us to a clergyman. We need you to witness our marriage."

That was my start. I didn't prevent a burglary of money, but I effected an abduction of a girl. The young man declared that without my assistance his attempt would have been futile. The day after their marriage the wife fell heir to a million, and they made me a handsome present, with permission to call on them whenever I needed funds.

MISSION TEAM PRESERVE UNBEATON RECORD

(From Fraser Valley Record)

On Saturday last the football team journeyed to Hope to return their visit on Thanksgiving Day

Although the Mission team was very weak owing to the inability of several of the members to make the trip and could muster only nine men, two substitutes were kindly found to complete the eleven, and after a most even and sportmanlike game the result was a draw of two goals each.

The Hope team began the scoring about seven minutes from the start but Adams evened matters up from a corner kick perfectly plased by Catchpole shortly before the interval.

Hope again scored in the second half and would have put on several other goals but for the splendid goal-keeping of Percy Cox. About five minutes from the end D. Lamont scored for Mission and thus equalized matters.

The defence of both teams was far stronger than the attack and for Mission R. Shannon and Catchpole nearly always had their opponentsb eaten.

Owing to the presence of substitutes in the forward line it was impossible to carry out much combination and so individual play was the result. In this Lamont always showed up well but owing to his reputation he was throughout the game closely markedb y two men but even then he nearly always tricked them.

The Hope team tendered the Mission boys a banquet at the close of the game and all too soon came the time for departure. After frequent vociferous assertions on their part thac we were rattling good fellows we retaliated in k measure and are now looking forward to their next visit, probably in quest of the Haddad cup, when it is hoped to give the Hope boys the time of their lives.—Com.
