MILL WEST OF MIDWAY

The Boundary Mining and Exploration company have sold a tract of land from the northwest corner of lot 422, comprising about ten acres, to the owners of the Ingraham Creek timber limits. It is understood that the consideration was $100 per acre. It is the intention of the purchasers to erect a mill immediately on this site, and it is planned to have the mill in operation by the coming summer.

A. G. Lambert and company, of Nelson, are said to be interested in the deal, being associated with some Ontario mill men. They hold an extensive body of excellent timber on Ingraham creek and logging operations are expected to begin at an early date.

It is clear that Midway is destined to be a place of importance, and everything, even the McBride railway policy, is helping to that end. The Ford fruit land project is being pushed to a successful issue, the coal developments are daily growing in importance, and the new mill will be another factor in the general scheme which the kindly fates are planning for our neighbor to the south.

PROGRESSIVE FERNIE

The District Ledger, of Fernie, has issued a magnificent illustrated booklet entitled "Progressive Fernie," which should be in everyone's hands. As a souvenir of the terrible fire that wiped out the Coal City last year, as a souvenir of what has been done since the disastrous conflagration to make Fernie the finest town in the interior it is unique, and orders for this charming publication will be welcomed at the office of the Boundary Creek Times.

A PARSON'S VIEW

A Chicago clergyman says: "If after a suitable acquaintance a girl would like to marry a man, but he does not ask her, then let her ask him. Why not? If she wants him she will probably give him a good many hints anyhow, so why not speak right out and ask for what you want. It is a useless conventionality and a silly custom, any way we look at it, to stick to the old-fashioned way."

LOVELY GEISHA GIRLS DRILL

The St. Jude's Ladies Guild Bazaar entertainment was an excellent exhibit of local talent. The charming costumes and sweet faces of the ten Geisha girls were especially pleasing, and their drill and singing charming. Mrs. F. Cummins gave a recitation for the children. Mrs. Oliver, Greenwood's favorite singer, gave much pleasure to the large audience. A short play entitled "Dumb-Bell," by W. W. Jacobs, was splendidly given with much success. Those taking part were: Mrs. F. Cummins, Miss Beldon, Miss Cunningham, Rev. F. V. Venables and Stanley Hart.

In spite of the fact that the St. Jude's Guild Bazaar, which was held in the Auditorium last Friday, took place the day after election day, when everyone was tired to death after the strenuous times of the previous few weeks, the Bazaar was a most pronounced success, socially, financially and in every other way.

THE HOME JOURNAL

"Canadians need not go far afield in a search for a good family journal while we have such a publication as our own Home Journal. I know that the Ladies' Home Journal has a wide circulation in Canada. It is a fine production, thought to me, tiresome in its bulk, and in many of its features. The Home Journal covers quite as many topics in less space. It is keener, less prosy and very well written. The covers are an artistic delight and are equal to those of the Saturday Evening Post, which is fine praise. Jeane Graham, the editor, is one of the finest women journalists in all Canada, a woman whose writings have been appreciated in the New York press time and time again, whose work is known and appraised in the Southern States, and to whom the New York Sun has more than once referred in a very complimentary manner. Why, then, do we not patronize our own wares? Why has it been said of Toronto—and you know how I love my own city—that she never yet appreciated her own publications? This I do not believe—yet I have heard it said—and you may depend on it, it was hotly contradicted—"("Kit," in Mail and Empire.)"

It is easy enough to be pleasant When life goes on like a song, But the man worth while is the man who can smile When the telephone rings and he answers it and says "Hello!" and the operator says, "What number?" and he says, "The bell rang," and she says, "No, it didn't."

BABIES' SORE SKINS. My baby had a rash something like eczema. It caused the child great pain and made it very restless and ill. The rash spread very quickly, and I was at a loss what to do next, for all the remedies I tried failed to give the little one ease. A friend strongly advised me to try Zam-Buk, and I did. That proved good and gave the baby ease very quickly. I went on with the treatment, and by the time the third box was used, all traces of the rash had gone.

MARK TWAIN'S BATH

Apropos of the marriage of Mark Twain's daughter, a correspondent sends a new story the famous humorist tells of the latest American invention—traveling bath tubs. One Sunday morning Mark was visiting a very wealthy cotton broker, who, above all things, boasted about his traveling bath tub.

"It runs," he explained, "by electricity, on tiny pneumatic tires, smooth and silent. Whenever I don't feel disposed to leave this room, it comes in here to me filled, just as I like it, with genuine sea water. All I have to do is to push the button."

"Push it now," said Mark, curiously. The button was pushed, the doors slid magically open, and the great onyx bath glided in stately silence into the room. And in it sat the millionaire's astonished little girl.

In standing by. I see your friend Barney McGinn," he added, with a grim enjoyment. "I doubt if there are many converts tonight."

Even as he spoke there came a shout of laughter and warning. The spectators scattered in all directions, and a stream of water from a well directed upon the itinerant and his muck-box.

A few minutes later the street preacher, flushed and furious, was trundling his muck-box toward the funeral home, his way to the coast.

Chapter 28

As Harry stood again in the obscure half darkness of his cell it came to him that the present had a far-reaching significance; that it was but the handiwork and resultant of forces in his own past. He himself had set Hugh's feet on the red path that had pointed him to the shameful terminus. He had gambled for Hugh's future, forgetting that his past remained, a thing that must be covered. He had won Hugh's counters, but his own right to be himself he had staked and lost long before that game on the communion table under the painted crucifixion.

The words he had once said to Hugh returned to him with a kind of awe: "Put myself in your place? I wish to God I could!"

Fate—or was it God?—had taken him at his word. He had been hurled like a stone from a catapult into Hugh's place—to bear his knavery, to suffer his dishonor and to redeem the baleful reputation he had made.

A step outside the cell, the turning of the key. The door opened, and Jessica, pale and trembling, stood on the threshold.

"I cannot help it," she said as she came toward him, "though you told me not to come. I have trusted all the while and waited and—prayed. But today I was afraid. Surely, surely, the man you are protecting has had time enough. Hasn't he? Won't you tell them the truth now?"

He knew not how to meet the piteous reproach and terror of that look. She had not heard the street preacher's declaration, he knew, but even if she had it would have been to her only an echo of the old mooted likeness. He had given her comfort once, but this was no more to be, no matter what it meant to him or to her.

"Jessica," he said steadily, "when you came to me here that first day and I told you not to fear for me I did not mean to desert you. I thought then that it would all come right. But something has happened since then—something that makes a difference. I cannot tell who was the murderer of Moreau. I cannot tell you or any one else, either now or at any time."

She gazed at him startled. She had a sudden conception of some element hitherto unguessed in his makeup—something inveterate and adamant. Could it be that he did not intend to tell at all? The very idea was monstrous. Yet that clearly was his meaning. She looked at him with flashing eyes.

"You mean you will not!" she exclaimed bitterly. "You are bent on sacrificing yourself, then? You are going to take this risk because you think it brave and noble, because somehow it fits your man's gospel. Can't you see how wicked and selfish it is? You are thinking only of him and of yourself, not of me."

"Jessica, Jessica!" he protested, with a groan. But in the self torture of her questionings she paid no heed.

"Don't you think I suffer? Haven't I borne enough in the months since I married you for you to want to save me this? Do you owe me nothing, me whom you so wronged, whose—"

She stopped suddenly at the look on his face of mortal pain, for she had struck harder than she knew. It pierced through the fierce resentment to her deepest heart, and all her love and pity gushed back upon her in a torrent. She threw herself on her knees by the bare cot, crying passionately:

"Oh, forgive me! Forget what I said! I did not mean it. I have forgiven you a thousand times over. I never ceased to love you. I love you now more than all the world."

"It is true," he said, hoarse misery in his tone. "I have wronged you. If I could coin my blood drop by drop to pay for the past I could not set that right. If giving my life over and over again would save you pain I would give it gladly. But what you ask is one thing I cannot do. It would make me a pitiful coward. I did not kill Moreau. That is all I can say to you or to those who try me."

"Your life!" she said with dry lips. "It will mean that. That counts so fearfully much to me, more than my own life a hundred times. Yet there is something that counts more than all that to you."

His face was that of a man who holds his hand in the fire. "Jessica," he said, "it is like this with me. When you found me here—the day I saw you on the balcony—I was a man whose soul had lost its compass and its bearings. My conscience was asleep. You woke it, and it is fiercely alive now. And now with my memory has come back a debt of my past that I never paid. Whatever the outcome, for my soul's sake I must settle it now and wipe it from the score forever."

She rose slowly to her feet, with a despairing gesture.

"The sacred others," she murmured.

a hard voice; "himself he could not save! I once heard a minister preach from that text at home. It was your friend, the Rev. Henry Sanderson. I thought it a very spiritual sermon then. That was before I knew what his companionship had been to you."

"If there were any justice in the universe," she added, "it should be his immolation himself now, not you. But for him you would never be here. He ruined your life and mine, and I hate and despise him for a selfish hypocrite."

"That was what he himself had seemed to her in those old days. The edge of a flush touched his forehead as he said slowly, almost appealingly: 'He was not a hypocrite, Jessica. Whatever he was it was not that. At college he did what he did too openly. That was his failing, not caring what others thought. He despised weakness in others. He thought it none of his affair. So others were influenced. But after he came to see things differently from another standpoint—when he went into the ministry—he would have given the world to undo it.'"

"Men's likings are strange," she said. "Because he never had temptations like yours and has never done what the law calls wrong you think he is as noble as you—noble enough to shield a murderer to his own danger."

"Ah, no, Jessica!" he interposed gently. "I only said that in my place he would do the same."

"But you are shielding a murderer," she insisted fiercely. "You will not admit it, but I know. There can be no justice or right in that. If Harry Sanderson is all you think him, if he stood here now and knew the whole, he would say it was wicked—not brave and noble, but wicked and cruel."

He shook his head, and the sad shadow of a bitter smile touched his lips. "He would not say so," he said.

"It should be his immolation himself now, not you."

A dry sob answered him. He turned and leaned his elbows on the narrow window sill, every nerve aching, but powerless to comfort. He heard her step. The door closed sharply.

Then he faced into the empty cell, sat down on the cot and threw out his arms, with a hopeless cry: "Jessica, Jessica!"

Jessica left the jail with despair in her heart. The hope on which she had fed these past days had failed her. What was there left for her to do? Like a swift wind, she went up the street to Felder's office. She groped her way up the unlighted stair and tapped on the door. There was no answer. She pushed it open and entered the empty outer room, where a study lamp burned on the desk.

A pile of legal looking papers had been set beside it, and with them lay a torn page of a newspaper whose familiar caption gave her a stab of pain. Perhaps the news of the trial had found its way across the ranges to where the names of Stires and Moreau had been known. Perhaps every one at Anston already knew of it, was reading about it, pitying her. She picked it up and scanned it hastily. There was no hint of the trial, but her eye caught the news which had played its role in the courtroom, and she read it to the end.

Even in her own trouble she read it with a shiver. Yet, awful as the fate which Harry Sanderson had so narrowly missed, it was not to be compared with that which awaited Hugh, for awful as it was, it held no shame.

In a gust of feeling she slipped to her knees by the one sofa the room contained and prayed passionately. As she drew out her handkerchief to stanch the tears that came something fell with a musical tinkle at her feet. It was the little cross she had found in front of the hillside cabin that had lain forgotten in her pocket during the past anxious days. As she pressed it to the ring at the top gave way, and the cross parted in halves. Words were engraved on the inside of the arms—a date and the name Henry Sanderson.

The recurrence of the name jarred and surprised her. Hugh had dropped it—an old keepsake of the friend who had been his bean ideal, his exemplar and whose ancient influence was still dominant. He had clung loyally to the memento, blind in his constant liking, to the wrong that friend had done him. She looked at the date. It was May 28. She shuddered, for that was the month and day on which Dr. Moreau had been killed. The point had been clearly established today by the prosecution. To the original owner of that cross perhaps the date that had come into Hugh's life with such a sinister meaning was a glad anniversary.

Suddenly she caught her hand to her cheek. A weird idea had rushed through her brain. The religious symbol had stood for Harry Sanderson, and the chance coincidence of date had irresistibly pointed to the murder. To her excited senses the juxtaposition held a bizarre, uncanny suggestion. This cross, the very emblem of vicarious sacrifice! Suppose Harry Sanderson had never given it to Hugh! Suppose he had lost it on the hillside himself!

She snatched up the paper again. "Who has been for some months on a prolonged vacation?"—the phrase stared sardonically at her. That might carry fearfully—beyond the murder of Dr. Moreau. Her face burned, and her breath came sharp and fast. Why when she brought her warning to the cabin had Hugh been so anxious to get her away unless to prevent her sight of the man who was there, to whom he had taken her horse? Who was there in Smoky Mountain whom he would protect at hazard of his own life?

Jessica's veins were all aflame. A reactor murderer? A double career? Was it beyond possibility? It came to her like an impinging ray of light, the old curious likeness that had sometimes been made a jest of at the white house in the aspens. Moreau and Prendergast had believed it to be Hugh. So had the town, for the body had been found on his ground. But on the night when the real murderer came again to the cabin perhaps it was his coming that had brought back the lost memory. Hugh had known the truth. In the light of this supposition, his strained manner then, his present determination not to speak, all stood plain.

What had he meant by a debt of his past that he had never paid? He could owe no debt to Harry Sanderson. If he owed any debt it was to his dead father, a thousand times more than the draft he had repaid. Could he be thinking in his remorse that his father had cast him off, counting himself nothing, remembering only that Harry Sanderson had been David Stires' favorite and St. James', which must be smothered by the odium of his rector, the apple of his eye?

Jessica had snatched at a straw, because it was the only buoyant thing afloat in the dragging tide. Now with a blind fatuousness she hugged it tighter to her bosom. One purpose possessed her—to confront Harry Sanderson. What matter though she missed the remainder of the truth? She could do nothing. Her hands were tied. If the truth lay at Anston she would find it. She thought no farther than this. Once in Harry Sanderson's presence, what she should say or do she scarcely imagined. The horrifying question filled her thought to the exclusion of all that must follow its answer. It was surety and self conviction she craved, only to read in his eyes the truth about the murder of Moreau.

She suddenly began to tremble. Would the doctors let her see him? What excuse could she give? If he was the man who had been in Hugh's cabin that night he had heard her speak, had known she was there. He must not know beforehand of her coming lest he have suspicion of her errand. Bishop Ludlow, he could gain her access to him. Injured, dying perhaps, maybe he did not guess that Hugh was in jeopardy for his crime. Guilty and dying, if he knew this, he would surely tell the truth. But if he died before she could reach him? The paper was some days old. He might be dead already. She took heart, however, from the statement of his improved condition.

She sprang to her feet and looked at her chatelaine watch. The eastbound express was overdue. There was no time to lose. Minutes might count. She examined her purse. She had money enough with her.

Five minutes later she was at the station, a scribbled note was in its way to Mrs. Halloran, and before a swinging red lantern the long incoming train was shuddering to a stop.

MINES AND MINING

The owners of the Tip Top mine have commenced operations and will work all winter.

A comfortable cabin for the men working at the Midway coal mine has been erected, and a new blacksmith shop completed.

Work has commenced on the Greenwood-Phoenix tunnel this week, which is the best news Greenwood has had for many a day.

A meeting of the stockholders of the Crescent Mines Limited, was held on Monday, November 22nd, at the old Colony Building, Chicago.

Will the Billion Dollar Copper Merger take in the Granby and B. C. Copper? J. Pierpont Morgan is at the back of it and that is some consolation.

A despatch from New York quotes Newman Erb, president of the British Columbia Copper company, as stating that the company's profits for the month of October, partly estimated, were approximately $38,000. Including selling and other charges the cost was 8.8 cents. In April of the present year the company produced copper at a fraction less than eight cents. Henry H. Melville, who has been connected with the Dominion Copper company for years, has resigned as director of the reorganized company, the New Dominion Copper company. His place is taken by

FIFTY THOUSAND SHARES
Of the capital stock of this Company are offered for sale at 25 Cents Per Share, $1.00 Par
To provide funds for the development of its coal properties near Midway.

The company owns the coal rights of 2,458 acres of land and has options on three square miles additional. Work has been done in development continuously since September 2, and a tunnel is now being driven to cross-cut three seams which show on the surface. Coal can be delivered from the mouth of this tunnel to the C. P. R. tracks below by gravity.

Development work done thus far is as follows:
One prospecting tunnel on the surface of the seam, 50 feet in length.
One shaft and drifts, about 45 feet, all in the coal seam.
One shaft and incline, following the proven seam to the depth of 80 feet.

An analysis of the surface coal returns 66 per cent carbon and only 3 per cent ash. The Company owns other properties, including fruit lands, mineral claims, options on mineral claims, mines and timber limits. Its coal holdings alone are considered worth more than its issued capital stock. An investment in this stock at the present price should be immensely productive.

This is an opportunity of which you should take advantage without delay.

Chapter 29

In the long hospital the air was cool and filtered, drab figures passed with soft footfalls and voices were measured and hushed. But no sense of coolness or repose had come to the man whose racked body had been tenderly borne there in the snowy dawn which saw the blackened ruins of Aniston's most perfect edifice.

Hugh had sunk into unconsciousness with the awe struck exclamation ringing in his ears, "Good God, it's Harry Sanderson!" He had drifted back to conscious knowledge with the same words racing in his brain. They implied that so far as capture went the old, curious resemblance would stand his friend till he betrayed himself or till the existence of the real Harry Sanderson at Smoky Mountain did so for him. The delusion must hold till he could have himself moved to some place where his secret would be safer, till he could get away.

This thought grew swiftly paramount; it overlapped the rigid agony of his burns that made the bed on which he lay a fiery furnace; it gave method to his every word and look. He took up the difficult part and, after the superficial anguish dulled, complained no more and successfully counterfeited cheerfulness and contentment. He said nothing of the curious recurrent and sickening stab of pain.

Many persons find themselves affected with a persistent cough after an attack of influenza. As this cough can be promptly cured by the use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, it should not be allowed to run on until it becomes troublesome. Sold by all Druggists & Dealers.

The St. Andrew's Day Ball on Tuesday night, was a magnificent success. The music from Phoenix was particularly good, and the evening was one to be long remembered. About 40 couples held the floor till the wee small hours. The event of the evening, was a Scotch reel in which eight of our leading artistic dancers vied with each other, led by the ever brilliant Sandy. Some really charming gowns were worn by the ladies and several bachelors lost their hearts.

A continuous telephone line from St. Paul to Puget Sound, by way of Spokane, is to be constructed soon. Independent interests have acquired a large number of telephone companies in the intervening territory, so that a through connection can be established without much difficulty, it is said. Seattle is to be the western terminal. This wire will ultimately give telephone service to New York, thereby making it possible to talk from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

In furtherance of their campaign for suffrage in Washington, the organized women of Seattle are planning to make a good showing at the coming school election in December. Registration is going forward quietly and they predict a surprising showing when the vote is counted. At the general election next year, the constitutional amendment, authorized for submission to the voters, for an extension of the suffrage to all women, will be an important issue and an active fight is to be made for it by the Washington Equal Suffrage Association, which has issued the second number of "Votes for Women," a monthly publication.

We are in receipt of a communication from the office of C. P. Walker, of Walker Theatre, Winnipeg, stating that his representative would be here in a few days to interview a number of our leading citizens relative to a production of "As You Like It" which Manager Walker is sending through the West. As this is the most delightful of all the Shakespearian comedies, and is to be given by practically an all-star cast with a most elaborate scenic and costume equipment, it is hoped that arrangements can be concluded for an engagement here. If the opinion of those interviewed is favorable, and sufficient interest is shown, a subscription list will be circulated and it enough patronage is assured the production will appear here in the near future.

BIG STRIKE

The biggest strike in the Kootenays for years has been made at the United mine at Ainsworth, one of the Highland United properties. Twenty feet of high grade silver lead has been uncovered already. It is one of the oldest mines in the country and was one of the first shipping mines in the Kootenay. Development in the past has often been abandoned owing to uncontrollable water. The mine is owned in Nelson and New York.

A Christmas Box that is Worth While

When you make a present of a periodical to a friend or a family you are really selecting a companion to influence them for good or ill during a whole year. If the acquaintances of your sons and daughters were to talk to them about as some periodicals talk to them silently, how quickly you would forbid the companionship! In the one case as in the other, the best course is to supplant the injurious with something equally attractive and at the same time "worth while." A food can be wholesome and utterly distasteful. Reading can be made so, too. But the Youth's Companion not only nourishes the mind, but delights it, just like that ideal human associate whom you would choose. The Youth's Companion fills that place now in more than half a million homes. Can you not think of another family in which it is not now known where it would be joyfully welcomed?

If the $2.00 for the 1910 volume is sent now, the new Canadian subscriber will be entitled to all the remaining issues of 1909. If desired, the publishers will hold these back and send them at Christmas time, together with the Christmas number and The Companion's new "Festive" Calendar for 1910, lithographed in thirteen colors and gold.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, Companion Building, Boston, Mass. New Subscriptions Received at this Office.

B. C. COPPER

An official of the British Columbia Copper Co., estimates that the company's profit for October will be over $40,000 instead of $38,000 as was reported. He accounts for this difference by the fact that when the metal reached here it was quoted at a higher price per pound than its value had been figured on at the works, where the estimate of $38,000 was made. The copper will sell at the New York price.
