NOTE AND COMMENT

Our esteemed contemporary utters a plaintive note of wonder. It cannot make out whether the HERALD is Liberal or Conservative. Never mind, esteemed, you just wait till the time comes and then watch our smoke. At all events nobody need entertain any doubt about which side you are on. In this connection one is forcibly struck with the simple pathos and natural truth of the following charming verse taken from the Primer for Good Little R. C. Grits published by authority of the Liberal convention :

Hewitt had a Kootenay S-mail
So Faithful, Sure and Slow
And everywhere that Hewitt went
The S-mail was sure to go.

Little Johnny : "But why did the S-mail go wherever Hewitt went, Papa ?"

"Because Hewitt had a lead pipe cinch on him, my little dear.

The Dominion of Canada under the auspices of the party of political purity has gone into the fake advertising business. The agent is, or was, not long ago, in British Columbia. It is to be a monster concern, taking in every province and place of importance in Canada. Prominent men are invited to put up for a write-up and cut of themselves to appear in its pages. The scheme is endorsed by Hon. Clifford Sifton and also by the Premier, and the agent says that if there is any deficit the government will go good for it. Our Victoria contemporary is very much put about over this busines and wanted Mr. Sifton to explain what he meant by mixing up the Dominion government with an advertising humbug of this description, when that gentleman was at the coast. But Mr. Sifton did not explain. As the Province seems to be thirsting for information on the subject the HERALD has no objection to supplying it with what it believes to be a probable and adequate explanation. Under the circumstances it is not altogether inconceivable that the parties behind this project are good Grits. As it is well known there are not enough government jobs to go round, but are the labors of the faithful members of the party of political purity to go unrewarded because of a little thing like that. Perish the thought and if an advertising fake will serve the turn the leaders of the party will write letters endorsing it, and if the rake off is not up to the mark, the government will not see good men and true stuck. All things are possible to a party of really enlightened political morality. Mr. Sifton is no doubt satisfied that the people getting up this book are, under providence, peculiarly fitted for the task. Perhaps some of them helped him out in Manitoba. This cavilling and inquisitorial spirit is unworthy of the Province. To the politically pure all things are pure.

An article on Sir John Macdonald from the pen of Lady Macdonald, which recently appeared in one of the Montreal papers, has brought back to the mind of every Conservative and every Canadian the thought and remembrance of that great Canadian statesman. It is easy enough now for us to take off our hats and shout Hurrah ! Canada is a nation ! But it is not easy to remember that scarcely more than a quarter of a century ago Canada was merely a geographical expression applied to a string of scattered provinces, divided in interests and sentiment, without means of intercommunication, without union and without desire for it. The men that welded them together and held them together during the first years of trial and danger were British statesmen in every sense of the word, moulding their work on a basis of practical common sense, saturated with compromise, moving slowly, without haste and without rest, towards the achievement of great designs. Among all these Sir John was the greatest, most farsighted, most untiring. He saw that confederation was only a name without intercommunication. He carried through the national highway and the nation was born. It is the very irony of fate that sent the leader of the very party that thwarted his project for years because they did not really understand it, home to the great Imperial Jubilee to receive the congratulations and plaudits of the Empire.

GISCOME PORTAGE TO GRAHAM

The Waterway of the Parsnip and Findley Rivers Described by Gavin Hamilton.

Gavin Hamilton of Lac la Hache gives some valuable information in the last number of the Kamloops Sentinel on the navigation of the Parsnip and Findley rivers. Giscome portage lies between the Fraser river and the head of the Parsnip and is the point at which the Kamloops and Revelstoke routes meet. Mr. Hamilton after bringing a supposed party from Kamloops to this point says:

"What facilities there may be on the Giscome portage at present for transferring cargoes I cannot say. At one time there was a tramway, but now I fear you must do as pioneers did, viz., pack everything. Pete Toye, Bill Cust, 12-foot Davis, John Brenneman, and a host of others crossed their boats and cargoes by sheer strength and stupidity. Folks are surely as good now as then. By reaching Giscome in April or early May you have ample time to cross, as the lakes are still frozen, and no doubt obliging enough to wait so for you. I strongly advise parties going this route to use no boats over, at the outside, four tons and lightly built. At the end of portage you will find Summit Lake, the head of these waters, leading into the great Peace and Mackenzie rivers. From Summit Lake you decend Crooked river (well named) a rapid stream, the willows often compelling all hand to lie down, the only danger being your boat's nose running into the bank and no room for the stern to sweep around. You soon come to McLeod's lake, a lovely sheet of water, roughly guessed at 15 miles. The H. B. fort is not over 50 yards from Pack river, and a few hours will take you to Pack lake, a small pond, two or three miles wide, thence a continuation of Pack river to the Parsnip. As it is now high water I would advise the utmost caution, although you are now on the finest boating river in British Columbia. You will go railway speed, so look out for islands with drift wood on the end, as certain destruction awaits the careless voyageur who gets in contact with one of them. There are no rapids and no danger to the wary. In less than one and a half days you will reach Findley, and be careful you do not pass it, as a bad rapid lies about one or two miles below, which in high water means destruction. There ought to be one man to every 1000 pounds of freight in each boat. Nation river is about half way between Pack river and Findley, so you may time yourself, as I have run the whole length in far less than one day, and I again warn you not to pass Findley and mistake the mighty river for a tributary, as it will look if low and the Parsnip high. From here up you will have a fine run for boating if the water is not too high, but I should say not navigable in the high stage. Keep the right hand river, as the Omineca and Oslinca, each large streams empty into the Findley, and if you go up either of these your trip will probably prove fruitless. Fort Graham is the only post on this river, established by my brother, and from there I can give you no further advice. The Indians say there are falls above, all I can say is, that if they are high it is worth a trip to see such a river tumbling off a precipice. The country is fairly level and rolling, but the mountains in the distance, where I often wished to go, beat everything I ever saw or dreamt of, not as stated in your issue of Oct. 22nd to the easterly side, but in the Klondyke direction, say northwesterly, I should think. Game is in abundance all through this country, moose, caribou, bear, beaver, etc., etc.

The Noble Three.

This is a group of six claims on Laforme Creek on Grandview mountain. They were staked by Messrs. Jackson, Gore and McRae, who have been doing some work on the Treadwell and returned to town last week. They have sunk a shaft about twelve feet deep and the lead has wonderfully improved under the work, widening out and disclosing a larger and richer ore body. It is a galena and grey sopper proposition. The ore ran $50 on the surface. Another of the claims the Barefoot went as high as $26 in gold from surface assays. A. Gore started for the Yukon on Monday, having disposed of his share in these claims to Messrs. Brown & Pool of the Columbia. He was accompanied by James Larkins.

A public reception was given to Rev. F. Yolland at St. Barnabas, New Westminster, last night.

GOLDFIELDS OF B. C.

Meeting of the Shareholders in London. —Address by Mr. Grant Govan.

At the meeting of the Goldfields of British Columbia, Ltd., and the Waverly Mine Ltd., held in London, on Oct. 18th, the Earl of Essex, chairman of the first named company presided. Mr. Grant Govan addressed the meeting and gave a few interesting facts about the great mineral belt in British Columbia, and went on to deal with the Albert Canyon group of properties which he acquired last year, and which was being rapidly connected with the Albert Canyon station of the Canadian Pacific railroad by a good waggon road—a road the contract for building which had been arranged by Mr. John Grant, the hardworking and shrewd Managing Director of the Waverley. They had the fullest confidence in this group of properties, and were concentrating all their energies and financial resources upon them, and "he had little doubt but that they would make great mines of them in the early future."

A lengthy description of the Albert Canyon properties followed. There are 10 of these properties, and the Waverley was selected first for separate management. Early shipments are expected from this property, and if all that we were told by the two gentlemen who addressed the meeting be subsequently verified, the success of the company is assured. Mr. Grant-Govan has himself assured us that this mine is going to astonish Europe when it starts shipping, and has showed us samples of ore which certainly are magnificent metalliferous specimens, while Mr. Grant's advices about the property were most encouraging. Experts have verified these opinions and have also spoken highly of the Tangier property, which was registered as a joint-stock company yesterday afternoon, and the capital for which is being privately subscribed by the Directors and their friends and the shareholders of the Goldfields and Waverley companies. Mr. Pellew-Harvey, of Vancouver, the agent for Messrs. Vivian and Sons, of Swansea, has assayed some of the Tangier ore, and says that the specimens were of "excellent smelting quality"—a very important point, because there is no zinc in it—"and worth £22 12s. per ton, of 2000 lbs." Mr. Grant-Govan quoted remarks in the Revelstoke HERALD—a provincial contemporary—in support of his statements. He also referred to Mr. Otto Abeling's experiments in the matter of the concentration of carbonates from the 74 ft. vein of the Waverley. It is understood that these carbonates will concentrate seven into one; and as Mr. Grant-Govan in his letter said: "If this should prove to be so, then the value of the Waverley mine is almost beyond computation, as the company has such an abundance of carbonates now in sight." Mr. Abeling's reports will, of cource, be checked by other experts. The company is now anxiously awaiting further tidings, which will decide whether the ore is self-smelting or concentrating. It is hoped that at least 1000 tons of this Waverley ore will be shipped and consigned to Messrs. Vivian and Sons, of Swansea, this winter, and the company has the decided assurance of the engineer that "the value of the consignment will not be less than £20,000 sterling." The Directors of the Waverley are already hoping that they will be in a position to pay a substantial cash dividend to their shareholders in the coming spring.

In conclusion, Mr. Grant-Govan said he would undertake to say that the Waverley alone can ship 1000 tons per week for the next few years that will net the Company £10 per ton profit. They had the Waverley, Tangier, Oldham, Montague, Detroit and other properties, and he felt justified in saying that the day was not far distant when the Goldfields of British Columbia would be recognized as "one of the most successful and dividend-paying corporations." They might say he was over optimistic about mining operations. He should rejoin that "the Waverley for one was not a mine at all in the problematical sense of the word, but a sound and already proved investment." At which there was naturally much cheering, for it was a very encouraging speech, and full of promise.—B. C. Mining Review.

The Ledge: There must be some redeeming feature about the dry earth closet system, but so far as it has been put into practice in New Denver that feature has not been shown. It is the foulest system of sanitary cleanliness that a decent community ever could be pestered with, and what this city has had of it can be only likened to the far corner of a hog pen.

A THREAT OF WAR.

STOP MONKEYING OR TAKE THE CONSEQUENCES.

The Vitican does not Approve of Laurier's Sunny Ways.—Lord Salisbury's Startling Pronouncement.—The Orphan Boy Case Postponed till Friday.—The Golden Cache Company in Court.

(SPECIAL TO THE HERALD.)

MADRID, Nov. 10.—Premier Sagasta has sent a message to the United States to the effect that Spain would regard it as a great misfortune to be given occasion to declare war with the United States and again asks the United States to assume a friendly attitude and help Spain to establish peace.

LONDON, Nov. 10—The Lord Mayor's procession yesterday was the largest and most dazzling in the recollection of the present generation. In his Guildhall speech, Lord Salisbury said that he hoped that ultimately the nations may settle all disputes by arbitration.

VANCOUVER, Nov. 10—At the assizes yesterday a man named Harris was sentenced to 4 years for aiding one Muller to utter bogus cheques to merchants here for goods.

J. Bousfield was sentenced to 2 years for trying to sell a stolen $100 bicycle for $10.

At yesterday's assizes the Orphan Boy mine case came up for hearing. The defendants, Haskins and Brown, were charged with attempting to defraud the shareholders. The trial was again postponed till next Friday.

In the Golden Cache mine case the trustee, Dr. Carroll, applied to the courts to define his trust, as treasury shares, unsigned by him, were recently sold. The court declared that the application was a proper one, and advised bringing an action against the Golden Cache Co. to place himself before court. The syndicate, who sold the present Golden Cache properties to that company, advised Carroll not to sign, as according to a resolution of the company no more shares were to be sold after mining was on a paying basis. It is concluded that the mine is on a paying basis.

NEW YORK, Nov. 10.—Bar silver, 57⅝; Copper, $10.78; Lead, $3.75.

ROME, Nov. 10.—The Vatican contradicts the statement that Rome will accept the compromise suggested by Premier Laurier of neutral schools, with religious instruction after school hours.

French Creek Co.

Mr. G. J. Atkins returned from French Creek last night after closing down operations for the winter. There is now constructed about 5000 feet of flume and nearly all the piping is on the ground. It will take about 60 days for the company to get ready for work next season.

The Ole Bull.

Mr. J. C. Ferguson went through from Rossland on Friday to the coast. The money to take up the bond on the Ole Bull, C. O. D., Roseberry and Big Bend Belle claims in Ground Hog Basin was forwarded by the B. C. Alliance Syndicate, from Rossland, last week. Work would have been prosecuted all winter on the Ole Bull, if supplies could have been got up there so late in the season. As it is, operations will be commenced with vigor as soon as the season opens next year.

B. C. Alliance Syndicate.

Says the Rossland Miner: "H. Seaton Karr, M. P., of London, England, has been spending a few days in Rossland. Mr. Karr is the president of a strong London Syndicate, which owns valuable mining property in the Big Bend country. It is the intention to begin the development of these properties on a large scale in the spring, and part of Mr. Karr's mission in this country is to arrange for the development of these properties. Mr. Karr is accompanied by J. C. Ferguson. The latter is a mining engineer of the syndicate above named.

The Canada Gazette contains notice of an application, dated from Montreal, for a railway charter for a line to Yukon to run from Cranbrook in East Kootenay up the Kootenay river to Canal Flat and thence to the Columbia railway to Canoe river across to the head waters of the Fraser river, thence to the Giscome portage, across to Parsnip river up to Findlay river and thence by the divide to Frances Lake and into the Yukon.

VEERING WITH THE WIND

Ottawa Citizen: Mr. Fielding is being congratulated upon the statement made by him in an interview with the London Chronicle to the effect that the Canadian tariff was practically "settled," and that there would be no more tariff tinkering. There might be slight modifications and a slow progress in the future towards a lower scale, but substantially present conditions were permanent. This agrees with what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said at the Toronto Board of Trade and it leads the Montreal Herald to congratulate the Premier upon his "declaration for tariff permanency."

While the Premier is justly entitled to the congratulations offered him his position is in marked contrast to what it was formerly. At the village of Arthur, in North Wellington, on September 17, 1895, Mr. Laurier said: "It was claimed that protection was a benefit to Canada, but it was the bane and the curse of the country." Again: "Sir John Thompson at Montreal said that the tariff would be reformed, but that they would keep to the principle of protection. This," Mr. Laurier went on to say, "was no reform whatever. The system was wrong from top to bottom. . . . . The Liberals are opposed to this system. They declare it to be a fraud and a robbery upon the people of Canada. The goal of the Liberal party is freedom of trade such as exists on the other side of the water in the Motherland." These principles were laid down in most emphatic language by Mr. Laurier at Arthur village but two short years ago. They were enuciated in reply to a Liberal address which said among other things "there was no longer any hope that the Conservative government would make any honest effort to remove that monstrous apparition, the protective tariff. We believe with you (Laurier) that protection is highly immoral, in fact we put it stronger and say that it is neither more or less than legalized robbery."

A change has come o'er the spirit of the Premier's dreams, as usual, but it is a change in the direction of reasonableness.

PASSENGER RATES

In Alberta Reduced to Four Cents Per Mile.

(From the Calgary Herald)

President McBride of the Board of trade has received the following letter:

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.
Lines West of Lake Superior
OFFICE OF THE TRAFFIC MANAGER
ROBT. KERR, Traffic Manager
Winnipeg, October 20, 1890.

A. MCBRIDE, ESQ., PRESIDENT CALGARY BOARD OF TRADE:

DEAR SIR,—You will no doubt be pleased to learn that I have received instructions from the executive of this Company, and from the executives of the Calgary & Edmonton and the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Ry. companies, to reduce our local passenger rates between Lethbridge, Medicine Hat and intermediate stations; on the C. & E. line, Macleod and Edmonton and intermediate stations; on the Prince Albert line, Regina, Prince Albert and intermediate stations, down to four cents per mile.

This is a reduction of 20 per cent, which I am sure the people of the Calgary district will fully appreciate.

The new rates go into effect on November 6th, as it will take until that time to get our new tariffs printed and distributed.

Yours truly,
ROBERT KERR,
Traffic Manager.

MORE GOLD BARS

"HANK" RESUSCITATED IN AN ONTARIO TOWN

A Simcoe Man Runs Up Against a Gold Brick Artist and Comes Out $57 Ahead of the Deal—An Old Story Retold—Bars vs. Soverein.

A wild west man from Arizona, a fabulously rich gold mine, a convenient bush, two gold bricks, a brace and bit, an Indian, a handy assayer and an offer to sell the golden bricks at an alarming sacrifice. Does anyone recognize them? To the police and the press they are dear old friends, that bob up serenely at intervals to disturb some wealthy citizen's serenity and endeavor to deplete his bank account. All these ingredients form the component parts of a gold brick narrative, whose events happened at Simcoe, in and near St. Catharine's and at Hamilton. One of Simcoe's well known residents is S. M. Soverein, and he is one of the central characters of the gold-edged sketch. On Thursday evening Mr. Soverein was visited by a dark-complexioned man of about forty years old, who gave the name of Henry Fuller, from the distant territory of Arizona.

Fuller further confided the information that he possessed a big gold mine, and as he once knew a man named Soverein he, in remembrance of the old days when they played poker together, would take the greatest delight in presenting to the Simcoe Soverein a share in his gold mine.

Mr. Soverein made no particular objection to having something of the nature of a Clondike claim gracefully tossed at him, and the Arizona man, to show he was in deadly earnest, placed in Mr. Soverein's hands $50, in cold, crisp cash. This was still more satisfactory to Mr. Soverein, and when the gold mine owner added that he would pay his expenses to St. Catharines so that they could inspect two sample bricks of gold from the famous mine, Mr. Soverein's cup of joy was simply running over. According to agreement, the two went to St. Catharines, but it was not there that the bricks could be seen. It wasn't safe for so much wealth to be kept in St. Kits; it was carefully guarded in the woods a few miles from the city. Would Mr. Soverein accompany him to see what he had to offer in the gold brick line? Yes, he would.

And so it happened that a short time afterwards Mr. Soverein and the Arizonian were to be seen wending their way to a piece of bush. They were met by a man who conveyed the impression he was an Indian. In some unknown tongue Fuller ordered the red man to produce, and, behold, there were placed before the astonished gaze of Mr. Soverein two gold bricks; at least they looked like gold, each sixteen inches by four inches and two inches thick. The Saw Bill bricks was dwarfs in comparison. Mr. Soverein was requested to sample the bricks, being handed a brace and bit. Up to this time it will be noticed that the Simcoe gentleman had no bit. Boring into one of the glittering lumps, Mr. Soverein got a quantity of dust, which he took back to St. Catharines, of course, in company with Fuller. Here the poor Indian drops out of the story On the way back to St. Catharines it was suggested that it would be as well to have the gold assayed, and by the strangest piece of good luck, a Government assayer happened to be staying at the Welland House. In room nine they found Mr. Wood, a learned-looking man, wearing gold glasses. Yes, he was prepared to assay the metal produced. The scales, acids and etceteras used for that purpose were put in operation, and it gave Mr. Wood the greatest possible pleasure to say that the dust was the purest gold.

Everything being so delightfully lovely, Fuller sprung a gentle request on Mr. Soverein that he would give him enough money to send the Indian agent back to his western home. Fuller was not ready to talk about selling the bricks, and Soverein said that he had a friend in Hamilton who would advance the requisite cash. Finally the two came to this town and put up at the St. Nicholas. Mr. Soverein, of course, was on to the stranger's game, and while the latter was in the lavatory he slipped out to a city jeweller to have the dust tested. When he returned to the hotel Fuller had vanished. Finding Soverein gone the Arizona man scented a rodent in the vicinity and made himself scarce.

Then it was that Mr. Soverein made known the facts to Chief Smith. He telephoned Chief Cummings, at St. Catharines, to arrest the alleged assayer at the Welland house, but it was found that Mr. Wood with the gold spectacles had been gone some time. What became of the Indian has not been reported; he has probably started on foot for his distant home.

The description given of Henry Fuller is; Height, 5 feet 8 inches; dark complexion, blue eyes, dark full beard, black hair, 40 years old. He wore a gray mixed suit, dark overcoat, white hat, with black band. Further, Mr. Fuller is slightly bowlegged and leans forward when walking. The assayer is said to be a six footer, of medium build, with chin whiskers. He wore gold spectacles.

Usually the gold brick swindlers come out the best, but in this particular instance virtue, as represented in Mr. Sovereign, is doubly triumphant, for he not only has the $50 of good money given him by Fuller, but the dust he got as a sample is worth $7.

MR. SOVEREIN TALKS.

Mr. Soverein is a tall man, with grey moustache and goatee. In conversation he appears to be up to date and is not the kind of man one would pick out to be the victim of a confidence man. He says that he was leading Fuller on. "I went with him to St. Catharines just out of curiosity," he said to a spectator man today. "I wanted to see what his game was. When I spoke to my wife about it and showed her the sample of gold, she said to me, 'Don't you go with him; he's after your money!' I said, 'I've lived 52 years, and have never been taken in, and you can bet that he won't get any of my money.' But, say, by gol, that fellow was the slickest confidence man I ever met. He had lots of money too. He showed me $1,500 in greenbacks, and wanted to pay for everything. I was suspicious about him from the start, and I consulted my lawyer before I decided to go. I was on to the game when I was taken to the assayist. I knew that he was one of the gang. I was afraid that they wanted to force me to sign a cheque, but I was prepared for them." (Here Mr. Soverein showed the butt of a revolver concealed in his hip pocket.) "Fuller's game was to get money from me to give to the Indian chief. He said that unless the Indian got back to the camp with the money he would be killed by the young bucks The only way I could get Fuller away from St. Catharines was to say that I could get the money at Hamilton. I enticed him here to have him arrested but the police were too slow. Fuller, I think, became suspicious of me, because he never let me out of his sight. He was a cunning devil. I think he is the ring leader of the gang that swindled the banker at Calgary."

THE HALCYON HOT SPRINGS

A New Health Resort on the Columbia River—Extensive and Commodious Buildings—Some Remarkable Cures

Taken From The Calgary Herald.

One of the best paying propositions in the Kootenay is the Halcyon hot springs, situated on the Upper Arrow lake and about 31 miles south of Revelstoke.

The property is owned and operated by the Halcyon Hot Springs Sanitarium company, (limited), composed of Captain D. H. McPherson, Calgary, Dr. R. G. Brett, Banff, D. McNaught, Fort Steele, and Dr. White, Banff, with D. H. Macpherson, managing director.

The company have built a three storey hotel, 30 x 70, with sleeping accommodation for about 50 people, besides five cottages with five or six rooms each. They also have first class plunge, tub, turkish and vapor baths. The water as it comes from the spring registers 130° Far., but cools to a certain extent before it reaches the baths. It is said to be the richest spring in lithium salts yet discovered in America. Already crowds of people are visiting the springs and some wonderful cures are reported. All C. P. R. steamers stop at the springs up and down and leave and take mail and express matter. The improvements this year will aggregate about $40,000.

Sir William Van Horne at Nelson: "In about a year I expect to see the Crow's Nest Road completed to the head of Kootenay Lake, and at the furthest by November 1, 1898. From there the line to Nelson will be a slow one, but of that I can't say much now as we are of course devoting all our attention to the work now in hand. Without doubt the construction of the line from the head of the lake to Nelson will depend somewhat upon the rapidity with which business increases. When the road is finished to the head of the lake we will ferry from there to Nelson, so as to connect with the Columbia and Kootenay.

BETWEEN TWO SINS

BY BERTHA M. CLAY.

"How did you make it?" I asked.

"Trough love of him," she answered. "Heaven knows I speak the truth. I never thought of the right or the wrong; I only thought that it was all for him."

"Can you tell me what it was you did?" I asked.

She shrunk from me, trembling, with an expression of utter despair. It seemed to me that I was about to solve the mystery at last. But she cried out:

"No—a thousand times no! The words would scorch my lips. I did not see then as I see now."

"And you say it was this mistake of yours that estranged your husband from you?" I asked.

"Yes. He said he would never forgive me, and I begin to think that he never will. I had hope once, but now I have none. So I pray that I may die, for the silence of death is sweet, and life is all bitterness to me."

"I could not press the question. I could not force her to tell me this secret which was corroding her very life.

As the spring grew warmer, she had fewer distressing nights. I urged her to come out of doors, I tried to interest her in the beauty of the mountain and valley, of flower and tree, but in vain.

"My heart is dead," she said to me one morning—I had taken her to Esthwaite Water, and we were sitting on a grassy bank. "You see the beauty of the sunlight and the flowers; I do not. Everything is alike to me—a dull, hopeless blank."

"Do you not think you ought to try to rouse yourself?" I asked. "I know there are incurable sorrows, but yours can hardly be one."

She looked at me with a faint gleam of hope in her eyes.

"What do you call an incurable sorrow, Kate?" she asked—we were so much together, and she had grown so fond of me, that she generally used my Christian name.

"An incurable sorrow means, I suppose, a sorrow which there seems no hope of assuaging," I replied.

"And what should you think would cause such a sorrow as that?" she asked.

I thought deeply for a few minutes; then I replied:

"There are very few reasons for an incurable sorrow. Death would not be one, for there is the hope of meeting again in heaven; sickness that has no remedy would not be one, for, patiently borne, it brings a blessing of its own; loss of money is not one, for life holds plenty of happiness without wealth, and hard work hurts no one. I am puzzled to imagine what can cause an incurable sorrow. The only thing I can think of is the doing of an evil deed for which there is no remedy."

"You admit that there is a ground for sorrow that can never be cured?"

Looking at the beauty of earth and sky, of the gleaming waters kissing the green banks, of the myriads of wild flowers and ferns growing around us, I was puzzled again. All this was the work of the great Creator. Would He who clothed the lilies, who fed the sparrows, give to one of His creatures pain that could not be cured?

"I am beginning to think that there is no such thing as an incurable sorrow," I said slowly. "We agree that evil deeds, sin, crime, are the greatest sources of sorrow. There is no sin, no crime, so great but that Heaven will pardon it."

"Do you think so, Kate?" and the mournful blue eyes sought mine with the first gleam of hope that I had ever seen in them.

"I am sure of it," I replied. "There is no sin so great, no crome so horrible but that Heaven will pardon, if pardon be asked."

"But man," she said—"why does not man forgive?"

"Man acts with human power, heaven with power divine. Men in this world judge, reward and punish according to human laws."

"Then it happens sometimes," she said sadly, "that while heaven pardons men punish?"

"It must be so," I said. "Take a thief for instance. He may repent of his sin, and may ask pardon for it with prayers and tears; all the same, men must punish him. He must be imprisoned, and made, if possible, to give back his ill-gotten goods. So with all other sins. I am quite sure of one thing—that, no matter what men may do, heaven always pardons a humble and contrite heart."

"Yet," she said despairingly, "my husband will never forgive me. Why should he be less pitiful, less merciful than heaven? If I knelt and prayed to him from sunrise to sunset, he would wave me away with the same cold gesture. Oh, Kate, Kate, do not be shocked, but I think—nay, I am sure—that I would sooner have my husband's forgiveness than the pardon of heaven." And her eyes sought mine with a wistfulness that made my very heart ache.

"No, you do not mean that, Lady Culmore, for in that case you must have loved your husband with a greater love than you have given the Creator."

"I did," she gasped—"hence my sin, my terrible sin! I will be wiser, Kate, I will weary heaven with my prayers for pardon; and, when it is granted, I will not cease to seek my husband's forgiveness. Oh, my sin, my sin! It was all for love of him. I would have gone through fire and water for him; and now—"

I looked at her in wonder and amazement. What had she done? What was the sin of which she spoke? There were traces of great sorrow on her beautiful face, but no traces of sin. A few questions from me then, when her heart was softened, would have drawn her secret from her; but I would not ask then. After we had talked for some time, she sat in silence, watching the golden light that played amongst the trees and shone upon the waters. Then she spoke again.

"Kate," she said, "If you loved anyone very much—so much that you forgot everything else in the world, so much that you forgot all about right and wrong—and you committed a great sin for the sake of the man you loved, should you not think he would find it easy to forgive?"

"I should think forgiveness would depend entirely on what the sin was, Lady Culmore."

The words seemed to strike her like a blow. She wept silently, bitterly.

"Whatever wrong you did, Lady Culmore," I said gently, "you have suffered enough."

"I shall suffer until I die!" she moaned.

I left her a few minutes afterward to go in search of some rare ferns, and when I came back she was lying with her face on the grass. She was sobbing—

"Forgive me—oh, forgive me. It was all for him; I loved him so."

And I wondered more than ever what was the mystery of this woman's life.

CHAPTER VII.

"Miss Forster," said Sir Rudolph, one morning, "will you take a message from me to Mrs. Harper? I promised to be at Bernham Woods by eleven o'clock, and it is nine now; so that I have not time to see her myself."

"I will take any message you please, Sir Rudolph," I replied, grieved that he altogether ignored his wife, who was present.

She looked up, with a deep shadow of pain in her eyes.

"Tell Mrs. Harper that I expect my brother, Mr. Ulric Culmore, this evening, and that he will remain a few weeks. I should like the blue rooms to be prepared for him." The blue rooms were two very charming apartments in the west wing, near to Sir Rudolph's; one was used as a sitting-room, the other as a sleeping-room. "Ask Mrs. Harper to see that a writing-table is placed in the sitting-room," continued Sir Rudolph; "my brother will want to study while he is here."

He bowed and went away. Lady Culmore came up to me, and once more I noticed the excessive whiteness of her hand, the palor of her face. She clutched rather than held my arm.

"Kate," she cried, in a low, terrified whisper, "Kate, what does this mean?"

"I do not understand you, Lady Culmore," I said.

"Why is he coming, of all the people in the world? Ulric Culmore—why is he coming? I—I am sore afraid."

"Afraid of what?" I asked. "Surely not of Sir Rudolph's brother?"

"Yes, of him," she said. "What is he coming for?"

"To see Sir Rudolph, and to rest most probably," I said.

"Do you think so?" she cried eagerly. "Do you see nothing else in it?"

"What else could there be?" I asked.

"He is a barrister, and very clever," she said.

"That has nothing to do with it," I answered, laughing.

But she continued to tremble, and I left her to attend to Sir Rudolph's orders.

"Mr. Ulric Culmore coming!" said the housekeeper. "I am glad!"

"Do you know him?" I asked.

"Yes, miss. He came to Brooke Hall while I was there, and I liked him very much. I am glad he is coming. He will be sure to bring some kind of change to this miserable house."

"Then he has never been to Ullamere?" I asked.

"No," she replied. "The last time he came to Brooke was to attend the funeral."

A funeral is an every-day matter, and it did not occur to me to ask whose it was.

"When he was at Brooke Hall, all was right between Sir Rudolph and my lady," continued Mrs. Harper. "I remember that they both drove with him to the station. He will be surprised indeed when he sees how matters stand here; but I think he will improve them. Both Sir Rudolph and my lady are much attached to him."

I remembered the white face and the frightened eyes of Lady Culmore, and I doubted if this were the case so far as she was concerned.

On the evening of the 27th of May I went out for a short stroll through the grounds. Dinner was delayed until half past eight, on account of Ulric Culmore's expected arrival. I wandered down to the lakeside, and stood there watching the gold of the laburnum, the blue of the lake, the rippling green foliage, the brown distant hills, until I was lost in admiration. It was the chill breeze coming from the lake that roused me. I had been absorbed in trying to penetrate the mystery of the baronet's household, and I found that the time had passed on rapidly. I hastened back to the house; and, as I stood outside the porch, which was hidden by great masses of white jasmine and climbing roses, I heard a strange voice say:

"You have visitors at Ullamere, Rudolph?"

"No," was the quick reply, "we have not."

"There was one of the loveliest girls I have ever seen in my life down by the lakeside," added the strange voice. "I saw her as I was crossing the bridge—a brunette, perfect in her way."

"Miss Forster," said Rudolph, quietly.

"And who is Miss Forster?" asked the unknown.

"She is, as you say, a most lovely girl, and she is as good as she is lovely. She lives here at Ullamere as companion to Lady Culmore."

Then I heard a light laugh.

"I should not have thought you would have allowed that. You were always companion enough for her."

I hurried away, the conversation was not intended for me; and surely he, the stranger, must have been mistaken in calling me a lovely girl! Why, at school the other girls were always teasing me about my dusky hair and dark eyes! Of course this must be Ulric Culmore. I longed to see his face, for his voice was rich and musical. I was young, and no one had ever praised me, no one had ever paid me any homage. My heart thrilled with delight at this tribute to my beauty.

Then the dinner-bell rang. I felt shy and embarrassed; but I had no time to think of myself. Lady Culmore came to my room.

"Kate," she said, "let me go down with you." She wore a rich sapphire velvet, with a parure of fine pearls. "Do I look nice?" she asked eagerly.

"You look perfectly beautiful," I replied. "That is a dress fit for a queen."

"But my face?" she said. "Kate, if you saw my face now for the first time, should you think that I had anything on my mind, that any secret was eating my life away? Tell me truely, Kate. Do I look like a woman with a secret?"

I turned so that I could see her plainly. The magnificent dress, falling in graceful folds, suited her to perfection; the pearls shone round her white graceful throat and in the coils of her fair hair; a sweet subtle odor was wafted to me. No figure, no face could have been more beautiful; but, alas, she was right—it was the face of a woman with a secret! The eyes and lips betrayed it—they were so constrained, she kept such a guard over them. She stood watching me anxiously, as though her very life depended upon my answer. For a few moments I was silent.

"And you do not wish Mr. Ulric Culmore to find it out?" was all I could bring myself to say.

"I do not," she replied.

"Then you must let your face relax. There is a restraint, a tension about it, that tells the story."

"How shall I shake it off?" she cried, suddenly clinging to me. "You are so kind to me, so good to me, tell me—how shall I shake it off?"

"Forget it," I said.

I regretted my words as soon as they were uttered. She flung up her arms with a terrible cry.

"Forget it! Oh, Heaven, if I might, if I could but have the power to forget it for one hour—only one hour!"

I saw that one of her fits of violent excitement was impending, and that she would not be able to go down to dinner unless it was averted. I talked to her, reasoned with her, admired her dress—admiration of such a kind, poor lady, always pleased her—and, by the time the dinner-bell rang, I had quite forgotten my own little gleam of happiness in having been called lovely.

I went into the room with Lady Culmore. She trembled so that she could hardly hold her fan in her hands. Som one came to meet us as we entered; some one with a handsome face and winning voice took Lady Culmore's hand in his and said:

"Why, Nest, you are not looking well! What is the matter? Will you introduce me to Miss Forster?"

Ah, me! the thought of the rapture of that moment will cause my heart to thrill with ecestasy until I die!

SOME ONE CAME TO MEET US AS WE ENTERED.

Never till then shall I forget his first glance. So I met my fate—the love that was my doom! It came to me when Ulric Culmore looked into my face for the first time. I remember it was only a momentary glance; but my heart beat fast, a mist came before my eyes, a vague something stirred in my heart; one glance from those beautiful eyes had suddenly roused my whole being into new life.

When I was myself again, he was talking to Lady Culmore, and there was evident anxiety in his voice.

"I cannot think what has changed you so completely, Nest," he was saying. "You had two of the most delicious dimples in the world, and they have both disappeared. I remember thinking to myself that, when I married, I would choose a wife with just such dimples."

How terribly awkward it was! Just as he said those words I wondered if I was blessed with such charms. I raised my eyes suddenly; and found that he was looking at me. I felt as though I had been detected in some terrible crime, and blushed to the very roots of my hair.

Sir Rudolph came into the room and went to speak to his brother. I turned to Lady Culmore, who looked very pale and agitated.

"Pray forgive me, Lady Culmore," I said. "What was the pretty name by which Mr. Culmore called you?"

A sad, sweet smile came over her beautiful face.

"Nest," she replied. "It is a Welsh name. I can not tell why it was given to me. It brings back so much to my mind. I have not heard the name for a year—for a whole year. I had almost forgotten it."

Then I looked up in wonder, for I heard a sound that was quite novel to me—Sir Rudolph laughing, actually laughing in the most light-hearted fashion. How completely that laugh changed the expression of his face it would be impossible to tell. I had been at Ullamere from Christmas Eve until now, the end of May, and such a thing had never occurred before.

"Kate," said Lady Culmore, "do you think that Ulric will notice Sir Rudolph's manner to me?"

I felt sure that he must; but I did my best to comfort her by saying that we would talk so much that it would not be perceived.

CHAPTER VIII.

The dinner that evening was, for two of us at least, an anxious interval. Lady Culmore evidently did not wish Mr. Culmore to see the peculiar footing on which she stood with Sir Rudolph. He himself did not change his manner in the least. Except for the needful civilities of the table, he did not address his wife. She spoke to him several times, and between us we managed to hide from the visitor the terrible state of things that existed. Yet I saw him once or twice look from one to the other with strangely wondering eyes, as though he could not quite understand or make out how matters stood. He was bewildered and puzzled. And, though it was a delight to me to sit there at table with him, where I could see the handsome face and listen to every bright, cheerful word that fell from his lips, I was glad when we went away. It was such an effort to keep up conversation in the circumstances.

Mr. Culmore held the door open for us as we passed through. He smiled at Lady Culmore.

"We shall not be long, Nest," he said "It is a barbarous custom for men to linger over their wine."

But I felt sure Sir Rudolph would not join us; it was not his custom.

Lady Culmore could not rest.

"Play to me, Kate; sing to me," she said, when we reached the drawing room. "Do something that will bring them here; I dread leaving them alone." She was pacing up and down the room, her hands clasped, here eyes full of wistful sorrow. "Sing something that will attract them," she entreated.

And I sang my best songs, French and English. They did not come. I knew they would not. Her agitation increased every moment, until it became almost hysterical.

"What will he think, Kate? What will Mr. Culmore think? He must see—he must notice the change. He will never rest until he knows the cause."

"You may be quite sure that, if Sir Rudolph does not come to spend the evening with us, he will not spend it in talking about you."

I read her fear. Whatever the secret of her life was, she dreaded lest her husband should reveal it to his brother. I knew Sir Rudolph was incapable of that.

I continued to play and sing; but the clock had struck 11 before they came, and I saw that the gloom and the shadow had spread to Ulric's handsome face and rested there. Yet I felt sure that Sir Rudolph had not betrayed his wife.

Mr. Culmore looked wonderingly from one to the other.

"You must not blame me, Nest. It is not fair to tell tales out of school; but Rudolph would not come. He would have all my bar stories over again. I told him it was not polite."

Then he came over to me. He talked to me, and the sound of his voice was sweet and pleasant to my ears. Yet I was not so much engrossed but that I saw Lady Culmore go up to her husband and speak to him. She folded her hands, as though she were uttering a prayer, but she did not offer to touch him. I knew afterward that she was pleading with him, in tones that might have melted any heart, that he would be just a little merciful to her while Ulric was here. And he had answered:

"A contract is a contract. Ours can not be broken."

The gentlemen remained in the drawing room for half an hour, and the puzzled, bewildered look in Ulric Culmore's eyes deepened. In his happy, cordial way he made an effort to bring them together. He asked if we should like a game of whist. Sir Rudolph said "No." In his conversation he appealed from one to the other, but Sir Rudolph was impenetrable; cold, impassible—nothing stirred or moved him; and, when Mr. Culmore found this to be really the case, he was too much of a gentleman to persevere. He let matters take their own course, and looked on in silence.

When something or other happened that revealed the gulf between this hapless husband and wife, I saw his eyes fixed on me questioningly; but no words crossed our lips.

Sir Rudolph seemed devotedly attached to his brother; the love that should have been lavished on his wife was given to him. It was delightful to see them together; he was so amiable, so attentive, Ulric so bright and kindly. But Lady Culmore was sorely pained. I did not remember ever to have seen her look so unhappy. Ulric made no change in his treatment of her. He was kind, attentive and affectionate to her. Either he knew her secret and thought nothing of it, or did not know and retained his old affectionate respect for her.

Mr. Culmore came to breakfast with us the next morning, and was startled at not finding his brother there.

"Where is Rudolph?" he asked.

"He seldom takes breakfast with us," replied Lady Culmore, her face flushing painfully. And Ulric, seeing it, said no more.

So the days passed, and, though Ulric's presence seemed to have brought light and sunshine, it wrought no change in the unhappy relationship which existed between husband and wife. He never alluded to it; he seemed gradually to fall into our strange ways. He was kind and loving to both, ignored the estrangement as much as possible, took the part of neither, and behaved as well as any man could possibly have behaved in the circumstances.

After a few days Lady Culmore recovered herself, finding that her brother-in-law merely wondered and looked puzzled.

How am I to tell what next happened! What words shall I find sweet enough, fair enough for my story? On Christmas Eve, leaning over the stile that led into the snow-clad meadows, looking up to the night sky where the stars shone, I had prayed heaven as a Christmas gift to send me some one to love me; and with the budding of the green leaves, with the singing of birds and the sunshine of May, my prayer was granted.

I seemed to be standing outside the gates of some wonderful land, when suddenly they opened, and the golden light fell upon me, blinding and dazzling me. At first I thought of Ulric Culmore simply as a scholar and a gentleman; later I began to look upon him as one of the handsomest, noblest, most generous of men; finally I found that his presence greatly affected me. Why should my heart beat fast at the sound of his voice? Why should my face burn at the sight of him? Why did I tremble like a leaf in the wind when he spoke to me? Why did every nerve and pulse thrill at the bare mention of his name? My heart told me it was because I loved him.

I gave him the whole love of my heart, and I never thought of its being returned. It was happiness enough to me to love him. I never thought of past or future; the present sufficed for me. Heaven knows that I was not presumptuous in my love. To live where I should see him, to do all in my power for those he loved, to live loving him, to die breathing his name—I had no greater ambition, no more fervent hope. To me he stood quite apart in the world of men—there was none like him, none equal to him; that he should ever dream of placing me by his side seemed almost improbable. So the lovely month of roses came round while the heart of the child changed into the loving, faithful heart of the woman and I was a child no more.

Particulars are to hand of a Hallowe'en row at Donald. It seems that three Donald men named Jamieson, Norris and Clark, started out to have some fun and amuse themselves by pelting rocks at a Chinaman's shack. Mr. Pat Murphy who was passing at the time was struck with one of the rocks and received rather severe injuries. The offenders were fined by the magistrate for the attack on the Chinaman's mansion. Then another Chinaman laid a charge against the same men of having robbed him of a small sum of money and other valuables and the trial is now proceeding. —Golden Miner.

Revelstoke Directory.

The first number of the Revelstoke Directory has been published. It contains 46 pages giving a complete list of the names of the male population of this place exclusive of the Chinese. The map of the townsite is the only one in existence available to the general public. It shews the whole town from the bridge to the station and gives the size of the lots and width of the streets. It is handsomely lithographed in colors by Bahman Bros. the well-known Winnipeg firm, and is alone worth the price of the book. Exclusive of the map, which was prepared by Mr. Crage, the work of compiling, arranging and printing the directory has been done in the HERALD office. Next year Mr. R. Parm Pettipiece promises an even more creditable and valuable issue.

The Anthracite mines have commenced shipping coal and will be very busy all winter owing to their enforced idleness during the past summer. The management are confident of being able to overtake their orders in time for the winter demand.

A man who arrived from the Crow's Nest Pass Railway work yesterday, says the Winnipeg Tribune, declares that the greatest hardship exists and that the men are treated worse than slaves. The unemployed can be counted by thousands every day. Men are put on for a day or two to give others waiting a chance, and all who could get out of the district in any way are doing so, but few are so favored. The last one hundred men taken out were really not wanted, save to intimidate the men and show that the contractors had no trouble in getting all the labor they wanted. The wages have the Winnipeger asserts, been reduced to $1 per day, and the men have to pay $4.50 a week for board. Fortunately he was in a position to get back. He was unable to save any money, and had to get his friends here to send him the amount to pay his fare home. The men are all swearing vengeance against the agents here, who sent them out under false pretences.
